"This was a good win for us because... we were on the road," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "The wind usually helps the lesser skilled team."

The match was originally scheduled as a home game for the Minutewomen, but was changed at the last minute into yet another road trip for the team.

Dixon would have liked to have seen her doubles teams get some more action heading into the Atlantic 10 conference play.

"I was really pleased with the way our singles won," Dixon said. "But I would have liked to see the doubles play. We needed to work on our doubles after the break."

The team had a four day break between matches and Dixon felt Fairfield was a good way to bring the team back into action.

The break in the schedule was an intentional one for the team to get healthy and regain their stride heading into A-10 play.

"We felt well rested and not burned out at all," Dixon said. "This is a different approach from past seasons, where we've gone into the conference fatigued and tired."

The team is building momentum for a strong run at the A- 10 conference.

"We're putting the bricks in place for a big run," Dixon said. "Going into conference play on high is good for our team."

While all the singles players won their matches, the play of Ola Gerasimova (6–2, 6–0), Annie Hamilton (6–1, 6–1), and Alli Tross (6–2, 6–1) were the keys to the win for the Minutewomen.

Kulak got in on the action again in the fourth after belting a double deep into the right field triangle. The freshman scored on a consecutive double by third baseman Keith Hutchinson to finalize the score at 2-0, UMass.

On a roll, the Minutemen got off to a good start in the bottom of the first inning when Skeffington scored after advancing on a wild pitch and sneaking home off of an error by the Xavier catcher, Madrovsky.

Scoreless in the second Inning, Skeffington, who had stolen 14 bases in 15 attempts prior to the series, walked and stole second to start off the third. Anderson knocked him in with a RBI double to left center. Braunstein singled to reach first but got caught in a 2–6–3 rundown, though Anderson, who was on third, scored before the out was made to raise the lead to 3-0.

In the top of the sixth, Xavier's Jay Denit broke Veracka's no-hitter with a single. Rodd Hampson was then hit by a pitch. Leadoff hitter, senior Zach Swisher, drove in Denit with an RBI single. Matt Watson smashed a double to score Hampson. Swisher then stole home on a passed ball by UMass catcher Samela. However, Veracka was able to maintain composure to hold on for the UMass win at 5–3.

The Minutemen return to their uniforms on Thursday when they host Northeastern at 3 p.m.

UMass then went out and completed the sweep on Sunday thanks to some more solid pitching and the hot bat of senior Aaron Braunstein.

Sophomore David Loonie breezed through the first six innings before tiring in the seventh. Fellow classmate Craig Szado was also impressive in the final three innings of relief. Together, the two teamed up to help lead the Minutemen to a 7–3 victory.

Offensively, Braunstein went 3-for-4 on the afternoon with two runs scored and four RBI. He had a two-run homerun in the first inning and added a two-run double in the third that hit the top of the fence in right center field. The Margate, NJ product leads UMass in homers and RBI's this season.

For now, the Minutemen appear to be heading back on the right track. A non–conference game with Northeastern is next on the schedule for UMass, on Thursday afternoon at Lorden Field. A-10 rival Temple will be the next conference test for the Maroon and White, as the Owls will come to Amherst next weekend looking to stay atop the A–10 Eastern Division.

The only question left to be answered, now, is which UMass team will show up the next time around.

20 points, cut the Devil advantage to 6–3. As Keith Gabrielli worked into the restraining box and set himself to make a pass, Kunkel came around to the Duke cage on the left side and steeled himself at the left post. Kunkel then recovered Gabrielli's pass and worked the ball just under Breslin, as the goalie was dropping to his knees in defense.

"I'm happy for Rich," Cannella said. "He had an extra- man goal and some other opportunities that were right on target. He did well, but he's missing Kevin [Dell]."

Dell, a sophmore who has served UMass' feeder, sat out Saturday's game after breaking his thumb in practice Wednesday.

Without him, UMass had to create its own opportunities and the Minutemen were able to do that with some success in the fourth quarter. Negus mirrored his game-opening goal with a shot just off the right with 10:32 to go in the game. Madigan pocketed a score of his own after coming around the cage on the right side with just under seven minutes remaining in the game. And Gabrielli finished out the scoring off an assist fromMcKeefrey by shooting the ball under new Duke keeper Paul Womble.

matchup was going to be a shootout, as is the case in many sports when UMass plays UConn. At the 20:00 mark in the opening frame, Husky middie Heather Levins tied the game at one with a free position goal, retaliating for a score by Minutewomen co–captains Laura Korutz and Melissa Anderson, who hooked up to notch a point under a minute into the contest. The scoreboard would then remain unaltered until the 12:11 mark.

Unforiunately for the visiting Huskies, who lost Massachusetts 15–4 in Storrs, Conn., last season, that is when the floodgates opened.

"We started off kind of shaky," junior defender Lynne Young said. "I felt like we were almost taking it for granted because we beat them quite easily [last] year. I think we pulled together and played like a team."

To make the score 2–1, Minutewoman Noelle Gorski fired a pass through traffic to teammate Stephanie Pavlick, who was sneaking around the opposing goalie's right. Pavlick quickly turned the pass on the UConn net–minder, Jennifer Schiavone, to record the first of her two points on the afternoon.

Pavlick, who has recently been hobbled by an ankle injury, looked lively in the prelude to the game against Atlantic 10 power Temple.

"I think Pavlick is back and right in the nick of time, I might add," UMass Coach Francesca McClellan said. "I think she did some nice things today — team ball and one- on–one ball, so that was really good."

Korutz and Gorski added goals to their assists within the following three minutes to up the margin to three, 4–1.

Effectively putting to rest any question of superiority in the game then was junior defender Melissa Miele, who, with 8:50 to go before halftime, sprinted through and past the entire UConn defense from near midfield to one–time a shot by Schiavone. By the break, the Minutewomen had extended their lead to 7–1.

Stephanie Pavlick

"I'm just pleased that we're starting to play team ball which, I think shows we're able to play more minutes of the game," McClellan said. "Our consistency is getting a bit better."

Stifling any chance Connecticut had to come back was UMass goalie Jen Nardi, who dominated her third straight game, following up a 20–save performance against Dartmouth on Wednesday and a Friday game against LaSalle in which the Explorers could only manage three points, with 19–saves yesterday.

"Jen Nardi had a great game today," McClellan said. "I think it was a bit of a break–through game for her, and that was nice to see."

Finishing off the 13–4 score for Massachusetts were Sara MacNabb, Pavlick and McKeon. Huskies Megan Campbell, Jody Nickerson and Abby Morgan added three in the loss.

Anderson also tallied two more goals, bringing her season total to 16, which leads the team. The Baldwinsville, N.Y. native also collected her second assist of the year, when she set up Pam Neale for a goal with 12:08 remaining in the first half of the game to give UMass a 10–0 lead at the time.

Noelle Gorski also did a great job for the Minutewomen as she scored the Minutewomen's eighth goal and assisted on two others. Gorski found Miele on the first UMass goal only 1:09 into the game, and she also connected with co–captain Korutz for UMass' seventh goal.

The Minutewomen also received an incredibly strong showing off the bench from players like Pam Neale who scored two goals.

"There were some really nice things our bench did today. They really put things together today. Danielle McKeon is someone who got out of her slump and really did some beautiful movements — one of the nicest performances I've seen from her," McClellan said.

Danielle McKeon scored a hat trick. McKeon scored her first career goal when she buried a shot with 1:00 remaining in the first half. That wasn't all the Explorers would hear from the sophomore attacker from West Chester, Penn. She scored two goals in the second half including the last one to close out the scoring on the contest.

"It was a really good game, everyone passed around well. I got a chance to take it to goal, and I had a little more confidence heading into today's game," McKeon said of her performance.

Olivia Cabrera scored a goal and an assist off the bench, while Katie Carey and Kara DePaula each collected a point for the Minutewomen.

"It was awesome! Anyone on our bench can come in and play for anybody. With everyone being hurt, their is a lot pressure on them now to do well and everyone came in today and did awesome," Korutz said of the bench performance.

UMass received a strong performance in goal from starter Jen Nardi who made nine saves for the Minutewomen, while only allowing one goal in her 44 minutes of work, before stepping aside to let Tara Durkin test out the mild confusion, suffered during a game with Hofstra last weekend. Durkin played 16 minutes allowing two goals and making a save.

The Minutewomen also downed UConn on Sunday, and are now set to continue their A–10 schedule as they head to Philadelphia for a pair of A–10 games, one with St. Joseph's and one with rival Temple. Getting their first A–10 win is key for the Minutewomen as they set to head back on the road, where they are currently 0–4.

"It's a nice way to start the A–10's, where looking at Temple they will certainly be more challenging. Today was a preparation for possibly things we'll see in that game," McClellan said.

Softball pitchers shine; UM sweep four A–10 games

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

Heading into last weekend the Massachusetts softball team wanted to show the rest of the Atlantic 10 their mettle. Despite a subpar opening to conference play last weekend, the UMass team rebounded by sweeping all four A–10 matches this weekend.

In double–header action against Fordham on Saturday it was a tale of two games. In the opening win, the Minutewomen exploded for 12 runs behind two, three RBI performances from Cherra Wheeler and Jacqueline Scarlett. Wheeler went 2–for–2, including a two run triple in the second frame.

Danielle Henderson pitched a one–hit shutout, striking out 14 of the 15 Rams she faced before the mercy rule was invoked and the game was called in the fifth inning. The win improved her season record to 10–2.

In the second game UMass struggled offensively, managing to score three runs all coming in the fourth inning. UMass capitalized on Fordham mis–cues scoring three runs on no hits and two errors.

The Women's softball team knocked off conference foes Fordham and La Salle in four conference tilts this weekend.

Sophomore Carrie Jeffries notched the win in the second game surrendering one run on two hits. In the seventh inning Jeffries worked her way out of a jam with the tying runner on first base with only one out. In seven innings of work Jeffries fanned four batters to improve her record to 7–3.

"I was very pleased with our plate presence [in the first game]," said coach Elaine Sortino. "Our short game was very poor in the second game. We did not execute first and second strike run opportunities. We got the lead runner thrown out at second base three times and that is not good UMass softball. I think our intensity at the plate was not the same [as the first game]. You are not going to create a lot of opportunity without that intensity. I don't think we were an aggressive hitting team in the second game I thought we were the antithesis in game two of what we were in game one."

With a rare conference loss to St. Joseph's last weekend the 3–1 score was too close for comfort for Sortino.

"We cannot afford in our conference games to give out anything," Sortino said. "We're the biggest game in everybody's conference schedule. We cannot afford a letdown in the first or second game. I don't think we intended to do that. We were not flat, but we were not aggressive either."

The UMass softball squad returned to A–10 action yesterday sweeping a double–header against La Salle. Henderson pitched a two–hitter in five innings of scoreless work for the Maroon and White. Henderson struck out 12 Explorer batters as she continues her assault on fifth place in the NCAA record books for career strike outs. She has already fanned 263 opponents this season.

The game was ended in the fifth after UMass amassed eight runs on five hits. Leading the charge for the Minutewomen was Mandy Galas who scored three UMass runs while going 2–for–2 with a walk. Her RBI triple in the second inning opened the flood gates and La Salle was never able to recover. Galas' teammate Teri Rooney also pitched in with two RBIs.

The second game featured UMass' third shutout of the weekend. Carrie Jeffries matched Henderson's two–hit performance with one of her own through five innings before the game was once again called on the mercy rule.

Three Explorer errors helped the Minutewomen's cause. The offense was clicking as well, scoring eight runs against La Salle. Galas hit two triples, including an RBI smash in the fifth as part of a five run UMass explosion that sealed the win for Massachusetts.

"I think it [Sunday] was a very solid performance, much better than [Saturday]," said Sortino. "I felt we had very good intensity. Both of our pitchers gave us very solid performances. I thought we played good defense and I felt we hit the ball very well."

Sortino was impressed with her pitching staff and their dominance over visiting La Salle.

"Carrie did a great job today against what I felt was a better hitting team," Sortino said. "It was a great effort. [Danielle] stayed ahead in the count which is something she has to do. I felt good about both of our pitching performances."

Over the course of the two games against La Salle, speed on the base paths proved to be a tremendous advantage for the Minutewomen.

"Speed is a wonderful weapon," Sortino said. "There is no substitute for speed. Speed creates a lot of opportunity for us. We are fortunate to have it. It is a tremendous advantage to be able to steal bases and run fast."

UMass will lace up for a double–header against the Crimson of Harvard as it concludes its eight game homestand this Thursday at 3 p.m. on Totman Field.

UMass baseball sweep Xavier for A–10 lead

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Downing the top team in the Atlantic 10 West, the Massachusetts baseball team improved to 14–11 and 4–2 in the A–10 over the weekend as it beat Xavier (14–19, 3–3 A– 10) three times.

The Minutemen produced their largest offensive front yesterday, which was highlighted by Aaron Braunstein's two–run home run in the first, as they won, 7–3. Sophomore David Loonie earned the start and pitched six innings, giving up six hits and three walks while striking out four. The righthander improves to 3–1 in eight appearances. Craig Szado closed up shop with three scoreless innings.

The losing pitcher, Jeff Barger, pitched two innings and was held responsible for six of the seven runs.

UMass got off on the right start, as leadoff batter Shaun Skeffington walked and Bryan Mazzaferro followed with a single. No. 3 in the order, Scott Anderson, reached first on a fielder's choice, scoring Skeffington. Braunstein then connected for his fourth round tripper on the year, belting a line drive over the left field fence to bring home Mazzaferro and Anderson.

In the only other inning in which the Minutemen scored, they made the most of it with four runs. Mazzaferro tapped a single into right field and stole second. Anderson followed his lead with another single and Braunstein cleaned up with a two–run double. Xavier made a pitching change, giving the ball to Matt Raih, who struggled to maintain control.

UMass catcher Brian Samela kept the streak alive, nailing an RBI single to bring around Braunstein. The Musketeers wouldn't score until the fifth inning when Mark Madrovsky returned the favor with a homer of his own.

Yesterday's totals for Massachusetts was seven runs on 10 hits with two errors.

In the first game of Saturday's double header, senior Bill Cooke returned to the dominating force of a year ago, going the distance to earn the 2–0 shutout. The left–hander struck out six Musketeers while scattering six hits. Though this was the weekend's smallest offensive output for the Minutemen, the defense turned it up a notch to keep the scoring down as the wind hung up some potentially threatening long hits.

Skeffington slapped a triple into right center to open the game. However, the rest of the order went down 1–2–3 to squelch any hopes of jumping out to a quick lead.

In the second inning, Samela reached first on a single and stole second on a passed ball. After Kulak, who went 7–for–9 in the series, moved Samela over to third, the senior catcher scored on first baseman Ty Brenning's

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team opened up their first ever Atlantic 10 Conference season with a 17–3 win over the La Salle Explorers on Friday afternoon at Ruth J. Totman Field.

Rachel Ingraffea scored two goals in the Minutewomen's two defeats of UConn and La Salle this weekend at Totman Field.

The Minutewomen came out strong and ended any type of hope for an upset by the Explorers, when they opened up a 13–0 at halftime.

"I think one of our objects was not to focus so much on who we were playing, but pay attention to how we played, which was not to start off slow but to start off strong — remaining composed over the length of the game. I think we did that," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "We started off strong and maintained that through the course of the game."

The Minutewomen made their mark on the Explorers using key performances from both their starters and bench players who all made an impact in the A–10 opener.

"It's going to make us look ahead to the rest of the A–10 games and give us confidence heading into next weekend down in Philly," Danielle McKeon said of winning UMass' first ever A–10 contest.

The Minutewomen were led by tremendous performances from Laura Korutz who netted another hat trick scoring three goals, while also collecting two assists, on her way to a five point performance.

Other starters also contributed, included Melissa Miele and Melissa Anderson. Miele collected another two goals to bring her season total to five. She has really been tearing it up as of late for the Minutewomen.

UM baseball back on track in A–10

By Michael Kobylanski

Like the proverbial roller coaster, the 1999 season has been filled with ups and downs for the Massachusetts baseball team.

A good game seems to be followed by a bad outing, and vice versa. Starting pitchers may be dominant one day, and then get shelled the next. It seems like you really can't predict which UMass squad will take the field on any given day.

Case in point — The Minutemen hosted Connecticut last Thursday afternoon and dropped an 8–0 decision to their border rivals. UMass managed only two hits and were downright awful in the field, making seven errors in the game.

On Saturday afternoon Atlantic 10 Western Division leader Xavier came to Earl Lorden Field for a crucial three game series with the Maroon and White. The Minutemen were already in a minor hole in the conference, having dropped two of three against Duquesne last weekend in Pittsburgh. Winning at least two of three games seemed to be a necessity for UMass.

When all was said and done, the Minutemen did in fact come to the ballpark with a purpose. UMass (14–11, 4–2 in the A–10) swept all three games from the visiting Musketeers over the weekend to climb right back into the thick of things as they go for their sixth consecutive regular season title.

"We played like we thought we could play [this season]. We got real good pitching and a nice effort [in all three games]," said Massachusetts coach Mike Stone following yesterday's 7–3 win.

Senior co–captain Bill Cooke started the weekend off on the right foot by tossing a two–hit shutout in the first game on Saturday. The southpaw finally showed signs of overcoming a slow start by pitching his best game of the season against XU in a 2–0 win. The victory was Cooke's third in a row after dropping two straight starts to open the season.

Another quality outing from junior Travis Veracka was in the cards for game two. The Stow native also went the distance, allowing only two earned runs and five hits in a 5– 3 victory.

"[Cooke] looked like the Billy of old, and so did Travis," Stone said. "That was the best that those two have pitched in a year and a

The victory over Connecticut yesterday was sweet.

The fact that it was the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's second straight made it a relief for their hunger, as the Minutewomen (6–4) have struggled to string together successive wins in the past two weeks over a rocky road schedule. The game was just what the team was starving for heading into a tough week of practice before spending a weekend in Philadelphia to play conference rivals Temple and St. Joseph's.

The strong team performance that proved that the bench was definitely deep enough to compete with other big schools in the region added a touch of flavor to the game, as sophomore Danielle McKeon completed a two–game streak during which she recorded four total goals to lead a young reserve group that relieved an injury–ridden starting lineup with confidence.

The dominant 13–4 final score made it filling for the Minutewomen, who had averaged an only slightly advantageous 9–8 tally over their 4–4 record heading into the weekend.

The fact that the opponent was UConn (3–7) made the win a delicacy.

"We were expecting [Connecticut] to be very good this year," UMass midfielder Denise Brey said. "Last year we killed them and this year we knew they were improving because they lost to Syracuse by only two and we got killed by Syracuse, so I'm pretty happy we killed them... It's a big school rivalry."

For almost the first 18 minutes of the game, it looked like the

Minutemen hold ground against No.2 ranked Duke

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.C — Going into this weekend's matchup, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella thought Duke was probably the best team in the nation. Saturday at Duke Lacrosse Stadium the Blue Devils confirmed that suspicion, beating the Minutemen 13–8.

UMass (3–5) was able to hold its own against one of the nation's toughest offenses and in fact held an early 1–0 lead, but the Blue Devils used a pair of four–goal spurts to outdistance the Minutemen.

With the win, Duke moves to 9–0, a school–record best mark to start the season and stays within striking distance of No. 1 Loyola, which will likely retain the top spot in the national polls after beating Syracuse, 10–8, in Baltimore.

UMass took its only lead of the game on an unassisted tally by senior Jay Negus with 9:17 remaining in the first quarter. After a Mike McKeefrey shot went out of bounds and the Minutemen retained possession, a pass found Negus at the top of the restraining box. From there, Negus fired the ball, bouncing it just in front of Duke goaltender Matt Breslin and into the Devil cage.

But the lead would not last long. Junior attackman Jared Frood, a perennial thorn in the UMass' side, shot the ball home off a quick passing sequence by the Blue Devils. After Breslin outletted the ball to a long–stick defender, Chris Kakel receiveda pass and found Frood just outside the UMass crease on the left side. Frood one–timed the ball just over UM goalie Chris Campoletano's shoulder.

Frood would not relent. With just under three minutes remaining in the game, he collected his second of the quarter. After T.J. Durnan scored at the 12:11 mark of the second quarter, Frood again displayed his scoring touch with a close–range shot from the left side off an Adam Dreiler assist.

Two years ago, it was then–freshman Frood who scored the game–winner for the Blue Devils in Duke's double– overtime 8–7 win over UMass in Durham.

Mike Janowicz, who has been a relatively quiet player for the Minutemen with only two goals and one assist on the year, halved the Devil advantage with 7:36 left before halftime. After a Duke defender saved the ball from going out of bounds, a series of UMass passes eventually got janowicz the ball. Without missing a beat, the junior attackman fired a hard running shot from 10 yards out on the right beat Breslin.

But Frood struck back for Duke, scoring the third of what would be a six–tally quarter for his team. This time it was an unassisted goal that went top–shelf against Campoletano.

"He's the entire package," Cannella said of Frood. "With the size that he has, the great skills... He's got great vision too. He finished quite well."

But Cannella also acknowledged the contributions of Frood's teammates. "You can't be as good as he is without the people around him."

It was that supporting cast that gave the Minutemen headaches after Frood's fourth goal. In the last five minutes of the second half, three different Duke players scored: Nick Hartofilis, Greg Patchak and T.J. Durnan.

Also during that time, UMass sophomore Rich Kunkel, who came into the game leading the team with 16 goals and

Parking permit prices may rise dramatically next year

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

There is never a shortage of complaints about student parking at the University of Massachusetts. Over the course of a single day, one will hear countless gripes about excessive meter fees, undeserved tickets and parking lot potholes.

One can only guess how the students will react if the current proposal by University Parking Services, which would raise parking permit prices by as much as six times their current cost over the next two years, succeeds.

Parking Services is currently negotiating with five campus unions, including the Graduate Employee Organization, to set prices on the parking permit stickers sold to students and faculty. Under the plan now being offered by Parking Services, the price of all stickers will dramatically increase over the next two academic years. Yellow stickers, which are available to anyone within the campus community, will rise the most radically, from the current price of $10, to $20 for the 1999–2000 school year, to $60 for 2000–2001. Purple stickers, also generally available, would rise from their current cost of $30 to $60 for next year, and $90 for the next. Green stickers, which are offered to everyone except undergraduate students who live on campus, would increase from the current average of $34, to $70, to $100.

"[A rise from] $10 to $20 is reasonable for students to understand, but $20 to $60 is very drastic," said Lisa Cook, the speaker of the Student Government Association (SGA), and the only undergraduate student on the Parking and Transportation Advisory Board.

"Students' problem with it is going to be that it's so dramatic," she said. "I think students are going to have to weigh out the options."

One source, who wished to remain anonymous, stated that during negotiations it was made clear that the goal of Parking Services was to price the students out of campus lots.

Sandra Anderson, the director of Campus Services, denies this. "If we were trying [to outprice them], we'd raise the prices to $300," she said.

According to Anderson, there are a number of reasons for this potential hike. The chief reason, she says, is upcoming renovations to the Campus Center Garage and parking lots. The University is planning to repair 10 lots on campus by the end of the year, including yellow Lot 13 near Mather Career Center.

Other reasons cited by Anderson include inflation and the fact that the price of parking permits has not been raised in 12 years due to union deliberations.

"Parking Services is a self–sustaining, revenue–based operation," she said. " We have to pay for our own staff and enforcement. Under Massachusetts General Law, the money we collect from parking tickets goes into the Parking Scholarship Fund. If we got to keep that money, there would be no need for an increase."

She added that the proposed price of yellow tickets would not have increased as dramatically if unions representing faculty members had not objected to Parking Service's original plan to boost the price of red stickers. Red stickers, which are available only to faculty, would have risen from an average of $64 to $125 to $185, but those figures were rejected by the unions.

One concern raised is that although the price of yellow stickers would be increased most dramatically, only one of the yellow lots, Lot 13, will undergo any renovations. Anderson responded by saying that the prices of individual stickers are unrelated to what renovations are being done in those lots, and that the renovations were being done on a need–basis.

"We look at it as a system," she said. "We're going by what's worst."

Overall, Anderson sees the increases as necessary.

"My personal opinion is that to go from $10 to $20 to $60 isn't going to kill anybody," said Anderson.

She added, "We have one of the finest bus systems in the country, and it doesn't cost a dime."

Weekend thefts end with arrests

Five University of Massachusetts students were arrested last week in connection with two break–ins that occured on Wednesday at the Worcester Dining Commons and an athletic trailer near Totman Field.

A UMass security officer discovered Tedros P. McCrary, 19, from Newton, at approximately 2:15 a.m. in a Worcester Dining Commons food pantry as he attempted to steal cereal. He was arrested and charged with breaking and entering nighttime for felony, with intent to commit larceny.

According to police reports and court documents, McCrary and two other individuals had entered the building from a roof ladder. Police discovered two duffel bags containing plastic bags of cereal. Police also suspect the three were also intending to steal the canned food in the pantry.

McCrary was the only individual arrested — the other two got away. The incident is still under investigation.

Four individuals were arrested for an attempted break–in of a UMass athletic trailer containing sports–related merchandise. Austin F. Turner, 19, of Nashua, N.H.; Kyle R. Bunchesky, 22, of Walpole; Jason M. Giza, 18, of Chicopee; and Michael J. McGrath, 19, of Charlton were charged with breaking and entering nighttime for felony.

At approximately 11 p.m., two custodians at the Totman Physical Education Building observed the group attempt to access the trailer, located just east of Totman Field, police said.

All five students were arraigned Friday at Hampshire County District Court in Northampton. They will be returning to court for pre–trial hearings on May 6.

Spring Concert confirmed; Bosstones to headline show

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Mighty Mighty Bosstones, KRS–1, Stringefolk and Cypress Hill are going to be the bands headlining at this year's University of Massachusetts Spring Concert in the William D. Mullins Center, according to sources from the Spring Concert Committee.

Music industry magazine, "Pollstar," also printed in a special edition that the Mighty Mighty Bosstones and Strangefolk will be playing at the Mullins Center.

Sources from the Spring Concert committee said that although all the bands are confirmed, negotiations still need to be made about the details, such as the amount of time bands will play for. They will go through probably on Friday, sources said.

Neither the Student Government Association (SGA) nor University Productions and Concerts (UPC) gave a formal statement on the bands but they did comment on the event as a whole.

Avi Khanna, the interim secretary of University Policy said, "The committee has been working hard since first semester to plan an excellent Spring Concert. This Spring Concert will make up for the last four years."

"The winner of the battle of the bands will be the student band that plays," said Lisa Cook, the speaker of the SGA senate. "Tickets go on sale in the next week or two. Free tickets will be given to all undergraduate students with a valid student ID. Tickets for others will be $17.50."

Monica V. Mitchell, UPC office manager said, "SGA and UPC are working together for a successful event, and I think Spring Concert will be a successful event for the UMass community."

Cook agreed.

"We've been working extensively to please all students different tastes in music and we're hoping that all students will be pleased with the different talents that will be at Spring Concert," Cook said. Other than talent, Cook said that they have reached out to corporations that are willing to sponsor the event so students can expect free items all day long.

Due to the expectations for this year's Spring Concert, Cook says the SGA is working to ensure that there will always be a Spring Concert.

"SGA has requested funding for next year. It depends on the Way and Means Committee. They decide the budget for all Registered Student Organizations, which Spring Concert falls under. SGA has put in a proposal for the Spring Concert to be funded again for the next fiscal year," said Cook.

Library to cutback subscriptions as budget-crunching measure

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Faced with a persisting budget crisis, the University of Massachusetts library system is now looking at even more cutbacks — this time in the number of journal subscriptions.

Due to a lack of adequate funding at the state and University level, the library system currently needs a base increase of about $2 million to regain the fiscal year 1997 position in comparison to other institutions.

The lack of adequate finances is due to the rising costs for periodicals above inflation rates, a decrease in University library allocations by the provost's budget and flat funding by the state legislature towards public Higher Education libraries over the last five years.

The state allocates funds to the University for distribution to various parts of campus. Over the past four years, the library system has come up short of the growing demands for state–of–the–art resources.

Julie Brigham–Grette, professor of geosciences and chair of the Faculty Senate Research Library Council, says such inadequate funding has stemmed from University cut–backs in library funds by the University Provost's Office and Chancellor's Office.

"We're going to continue to slip because we are going to be cutting back on journal collections," Brigham–Grette said. "We have not been given adequate funds from the Provost's Office."

Brigham–Grette said that instead of keeping up with increasing price level of books and journals, the Provost's Office has been allocating funds to other needy parts of campus.

The library has been losing finances for a while and though it once was cutting back on new book purchases, it can no longer do this. Instead, it must now sacrifice its journal subscriptions.

According to a press release, in Fiscal Year (FY) 87 the library system ranked 51 among the 121 recognized U.S. Research Libraries. By FY 97, the library slipped to 76 and in FY 98, it again slipped to 80. This year, it is expected to drop even further.

According to the Campus Budget Office, during the current fiscal year, the library received approximately $7 million in base allocations from campus sources and around $3 million in state library appropriation.

An individual at the Campus Budget Office says state money is given to University vice chancellors to be allocated to different departments on campus. Such an estimate indicates that Cohen took to Europe last week to visit NATO military planners and troops in Italy and Germany later wrote Clinton urging him to support planning for ground troops.

Cohen, meeting with reporters at Barksdale, said airstrikes are taking a toll on Serb forces, lowering morale and prompting some to desert. "NATO forces are making significant military progress," the secretary said.

Town Meeting will hear case on smoking ban

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — After sevetal months of playing referee as bar owners and the Board of Health duke it out over the smoking ban, the Select Board is supporting a petition to let Town Meeting make the final call.

"We're not talking about a health issue. We're talking about a right [to do business] issue," said Chick Delano, owner of Delano's restaurant.

"We really have to think about health considerations. I know there is a lot of [concern] about what's going on economically," said Valerie Steinberg, chairperson of the Board of Health.

A petition brought by Pub and Rafters owner Jerry Jolly and Delano's owner Chick Delano, requests Town Meeting to allow patrons to smoke as long as affordable and efficient filtration systems are installed in the bar. The petition stipulates that this variance in the smoking ban would only last until there is a state–wide smoking ban.

Some Select Board members felt defining what an efficient and affordable filtration system is would be difficult. The cost to smaller bars to install the system was also raised in addition to the possibility a bar could lose money by installing a system only to have the state pass its smoking ban soon after.

Stenberg said the whole idea wouldn't work because the Board of Health had looked extentively into filtration systems and found none that were effective and affordable.

Select Board member Hill Boss suggested taking the matter, if it is passed by Town Meeting, out of the bar owners' and Board of Health's hands all together.

We need a "well versed, educated scientifically, third party to sit down and come up with a resolution to this," he said.

Bar owners claim they are losing money because patrons are going to bars in towns that allow smoking. If the petition is passed in Town

Clinton resolves to win by air as ground support grows

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

BARKSDALE AIR FORCE BASE, La. — Despite growing support in Congress for using ground troops, President Clinton expressed resolve yesterday to win the air war against Yugoslavia and said President Slobodan Milosevic "should be under no illusions that we will end it from weariness."

At this home for B-52 bombers and A-10 attack planes, Clinton met with crews who have flown strikes against Yugoslavia and will be heading back overseas soon.

"We are determined to continue on this mission, and we will prevail because of you and people like you," the president said in a speech near the flight line. He said the United States and its allies "would like to nip this conflict in the bud before it destabilizes all of Europe."

Clinton told the military personnel and their families that Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was meeting with NATO ministers in Brussels, Belgium, to reaffirm "our common commitment to do what is necessary to prevail."

But the administration continued to resist sending ground forces while saying NATO has that option if the need arises.

"We do not believe it is necessary," Defense Secretary William Cohen said. "The president has indicated he has no plans or intent to use ground troops."

The United States has assigned 500 planes to the air operations over Yugoslavia, part of an allied force of close to 700 planes. As the bombing entered its 20th day, Cohen said, "President Clinton knew — all of us knew — that this struggle was not going to be quick or easy or neat. But we understood that we're going to prevail."

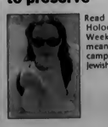
After a four-hour visit, Clinton returned to Washington for an evening meeting with the five top leaders of Congress, back in town after a two-week Easter recess. Today, 50 to 60 House and Senate members will go to the White House to talk with the president.

The administration is expected to ask Congress this week for money to pay for U.S. participation in the NATO campaign, administration and congressional officials said. They said the administration was considering requesting $2.5 billion to $3 billion.

Republicans and Democrats alike are becoming increasingly restive and hawkish on Kosovo, probably reflecting a shift in public opinion polls in favor of introducing ground troops. Particularly, more and more key members of both parties are criticizing Clinton's decision to count solely on air power to win the conflict. "You don't want to preclude a legitimate option," said Sen. Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) back from a weekend tour of a refugee camp in Macedonia.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) one of the most outspoken critics of the administration's planning, is pressing for the Senate to take up a resolution this week to authorize the president to use "whatever force is necessary" to resolve the conflict.

"We're in it; let's win it," Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) said in a warm-up speech for Clinton. Her comments reflect a seniment spreading through the rank-and-file in Congress for ground troops. Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott and House Speaker Dennis Hassert so far are taking a wait-and-see approach. Nine of 11 members of Congress that Cohen took to Europe last week to visit NATO military planners and troops in Italy and Germany later wrote Clinton urging him to support planning for ground troops.



Cohen, meeting with reporters at Barksdale, said airstrikes are taking a toll on Serb forces, lowering morale and prompting some to desert. "NATO forces are making significant military progress," the secretary said.

McDougal aquitted of obstructing Starr

By Peggy Harris
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Susan McDougal thwarted Kenneth Starr once again yesterday as a jury acquitted her of obstructing the independent counsel's Whitewater inquiry and deadlocked on two other charges, causing a mistrial.

"I'm still a little numb," a jubilant McDougal said outside the courthouse. "I've been indicted since 1993, and this is the first day I haven't been indicted in years."

President Clinton was "pleased to learn" that his former Whitewater business partner was acquitted of obstruction of justice, said White House spokesman Joe Lockhart. "He wishes all the best for her and her family."

McDougal's legal troubles may not be over, however. Prosecutor Mark Barrett said Starr anticipated making a decision this week on whether to seek a retrial of the two criminal contempt charges stemming from her refusal to answer grand jury questions in 1996 and 1998.

"This is a notorious case of someone basically being warned time and again and simply not answering questions," said Barrett. "I make no apologies for bringing this case."

The jury deadlocked 7-5 in favor of acquittal on the contempt counts. Barrett said prosecutors would ask the court for permission to interview jurors about their reasoning. One juror told reporters that McDougal's state of mind — she said she feared prosecutors — was the key to the case.

The five-week trial featured an unusual lineup of witnesses: three grand jurors, three Whitewater prosecutors, another woman charged with obstructing Starr's investigation and videotaped testimony from Hillary Rodham Clinton.

McDougal took the witness stand in her own defense, answering some of the same questions she refused to address in front of the grand juries.

McDougal's lawyers attempted to put Starr's tactics on trial, arguing that her refusal to give grand jury testimony was based on justifiable fear that she would be charged with perjury unless she falsely implicated the president and first lady in wrongdoing.

McDougal said her defense attorneys proved that Starr "was not seeking the truth."

After eight hours and 45 minutes of deliberations, spread over three days, the jurors sent out a note at midday yesterday saying they were "hopelessly deadlocked" on two counts.

U.S. District Judge George Howard Jr. polled the jurors, and nine said it would be a waste of time to continue deliberating. "I don't believe in arm-twisting," Howard said before declaring a mistrial on those two counts and allowing the jury to announce its verdict on obstruction.

McDougal lawyer Mark Geragos challenged prosecutors to try his client again, saying, "They don't have the guts to retry this case again because now we know where the bodies are buried."

Later he added of Starr: "This guy is out of control. Put him out of his misery. Put the country out of its misery and get rid of him."

Barrett said that if there is a retrial on the two criminal contempt counts, it's unlikely McDougal would be allowed to again inject her allegations that Starr wanted her to lie. McDougal's accusation was allowed into the trial only as a defense to the obstruction charge, under which prosecutors were required to show that McDougal had acted with corrupt intent when she refused to testify.

Meeting it would mean bar owners wouldn't have to worry about competition from smoker- friendly towns before a state-wide ban is imposed.

Steinberg said in studies she has seen, the areas with a smoking ban actually see an increase in their tax revenue.

But Boss challenged those studies.

"You act as though bars and restaurants are the same and they're not," Boss said.

"There are many fewer studies about bars mostly because there are not many [towns banning smoking in bars]," Steinberg said.

Select Board Chairperson Bryan Harvey also pointed out that while the total revenue may have increased in smoke- free towns studied, there may have been some turnover of businesses when the ban first went into effect.

The petition was supported unanimously by the Select Board last night with Board member Dolly Jolly. Jerry Jolly's wife, absent during the debate and vote.

Town Meeting member Isaac Ben-Ezra also received support from the Select Board last night for a petition calling for a state-wide smoking ban.

However Select Board member Carl Seppala said State Representative Ellen Story said at a forum on the issue last week that the likelihood of passing a state-wide ban is not good. A bill for a state-wide ban is currently going through the state legislature.

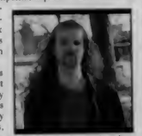
Spreading the wealth



"No new taxes" is a slogan that politicians love to use, and one that many voters love to hear even more. However, many of these same voters want more and better services at the same time. For example, most voters favor improving public education but at the same time bicker when they realize they will have to pay for it to get it.

For the upcoming fiscal year, New Hampshire's public school system will face a financial crisis if it does not find a source for its funding. In fact, according to The New York Times, teachers will be sent warnings which state that their jobs may be in question come this fall.

The reason for the pending crisis is rooted in the state's decision to shift school funding from heavy local property taxes to another source. Possible sources include gambling taxes, a state property tax, business taxes, entertainment taxes, or the most discussed one, an income tax.

Why put the school system in immediate jeopardy like this? Why not simply keep the property tax in place until a better solution is found?

The property tax is something a majority of voters wanted cut back. But given that the only way a legislature completes a task is when someone else forces it to do so, and that even the court–ordered date of April 1 could not be met, it is obvious that cutting off funding for schools is important in finding a new source.

Jason Weisenbach

"Even Republicans, who traditionally favor fewer taxes, though, have begun to question a no–tax stance."

The courts made an intelligent decision in stating that the use of local property taxes is illegal as the primary source of funding for schools in the state. The court cited that financing schools through local taxes creates significant differences in spending per pupil from town to town, which is unconstitutional. Eliminating this law means that no longer will richer towns have better schools simply because of the value of the town's homes and land.

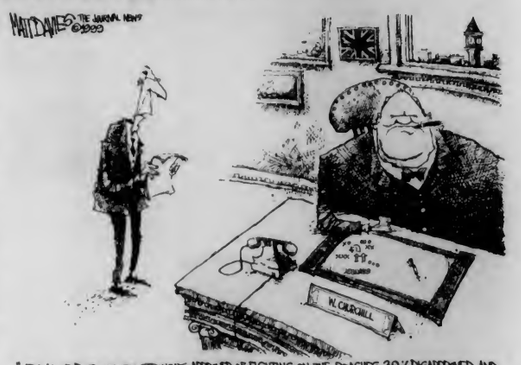
Using local property taxes may have worked out well for the richer towns, but the poorer towns could never have the same funding because they could not charge their residents enough to match nearby wealthy towns. A solution, then, would logically attempt to even out the funding difference by spreading the wealth across the state.

A state property tax would pool all the money together, but it would still have the same flaws that local property taxes have. A property tax penalizes those who do not make a lot of money yet still own their home. Many elderly rely on social security for living expenses, and a property tax hurts them much more than it hurts the middle–aged upper class business people.

Therefore, a solution would not disproportionately tax those who cannot afford to pay but will still spread wealth across the state. Hence, the income tax idea was proposed and temporarily was passed at a rate of 3.5 percent, but then it was rejected by the legislature.

I feel an income tax is the perfect solution because it succeeds in taxing those who can afford it most, it pools all the money for state–wide even distribution, and those with low incomes would likely face little burden from it. If we remember, though, New Hampshire is famous for its stance on low taxes, so passing an income tax for the first time would be a major change for this state, one which some are not ready to see.

While voters polled may favor an income tax as the best solution, Democratic Governor Jeanne Shaheen has promised a veto, regardless of whether the people want it or not. She wants to stay true to her pledge of no new drastic tax changes.



Even Republicans, who traditionally favor fewer taxes, though, have begun to question a no–tax stance, with State Senator James Squires saying that that kind of pledge "stifles our thinking and diminishes our capacity for logic." I agree with this as well because appealing to voters during a campaign with this stance forces most candidates to live up to what they believe voters want, and if politicians do not, they face losing respect by being deemed a fraud.

It seems, though, that voters are ready to consider an alternative, or at least they desire lower taxes less, if it means better education for all of the state. Perhaps, then, New Hampshire has realized that consistently giving certain students better education just because a town has pricier property does not permit equality in educational opportunities. An income tax, however, will help poorer towns obtain the equipment and teachers that richer towns have had the benefit of for years.

The 3.5 percent flat–rate tax itself, though, still will not help those who are poor to begin with, for better schools alone will not allow a child all of the opportunities available. A flat tax always penalizes moderate income persons the most because they can afford to part with it the least, whereas richer persons can afford the tax more easily. The rich still will have more stability and opportunity outside the schools.

Regardless, though, an income tax would certainly bring the state closer to a more egalitarian system. In a country that watches the richest 5 percent's income increase astronomically while the middle class disappears, the best way to stop this is to tax the richer more and the poor less. Therefore, everyone can have the stability and opportunity to develop and not worry over earning enough money to survive that so many of us want.

Baby, one more time

It is proven scientific fact that there are three ways to become famous. The first is to be a Spelling and the second is to sleep with the President. (Did I mention that I am the President?) The third is a new one, and it is to be a Mickey Mouse Club alum. We have Keri Russell from my favorite show "Felicity." Next we have Justin and J.C. from N'Sync (which is a better group than the Beatles if you ask me, which you probably won't after just having read that). And then you have every teenage boy's and Collegian staff member's wet dream: Britney Spears.

Lenny Holston

"The Stone Britney spread (no pun intended, well okay, it was) is also going to open doors for the local weirdos."

I was only too happy when I saw the little Lolita on the cover of Rolling Stone. I bought it and read the article — okay, I did not even realize that there were even any words printed; I just ogled the pictures. Sporting pigtails, out–fitted as a cheerleader, and as a roller girl, this hot chiquita was dressed as every fantasy I ever had.

After a few days I had a moment of clarity (a la Jerry Maguire). I was sitting on the can in a locked stall with the magazine in one hand and something else in the other and thought, "What the #@&* am I doing — she's only 17–years–old!" Then it all started make sense.

I finally got around to actually reading the damn article. It is very disturbing. It starts out like one of those Penthouse letters to the editor (so I have been told). "As she extends one of her honeyed legs over the couch... she wears a tight shirt that... is extended by her ample chest." As I wiped away the long string of drool coming from my mouth, I realized that what I had before me was kiddie porn, as was the Britney Spears article I had right next to it (just kidding).

It is bad enough that the poor girl has such a phallic last name; does she really need this kind of attention, too?

Now what if Mr. Joe Six–pack (of Coors Cutter), were to take sexual pictures of some teenage girl from the neighborhood? Even if it were consensual and innocuous, I would be thrown in prison and receive some "Spears" of my own. And even after I was released, the crime would still follow me. I would be getting married and folks would ask, "Where are you and your fiancee registered?" and I would have to answer "My wife is registered at Macy's, me, I am registered downtown as a sex offender."

Drawing the line between art and pornography is quite a different story than drawing the line between art and kiddie porn, which is a federal offense. Should Rolling Stone be exempt because they claim their pictorial of Britney is art? There is even a photo of Britney's younger sister in which even she is portrayed as a sexual object. She cannot be any more than 12–years–old! Is this okay, just because it is Rolling Stone?

Rolling Stone is a trend–setting magazine. The Collegian is now thinking of running risque photos of that little Pepsi girl wearing a thong. Just kidding — she is not wearing any underwear. The Stone Britney spread (no pun intended, well okay, it was) is also going to open doors for the local weirdos.

You know how some people have bumper stickers that read "My daughter is a honor roll student at Williams Elementary School"? Well, now the sticky doors of kiddie porn are opened to the guy with the bumper sticker that reads "My girlfriend is a honor roll student at Williams Elementary School." Scary isn't it?

Rolling Stone is going to see its sales rise and live Records will see Spears' CD fly off the shelves. Other media entities are going to follow suit because of this. My advice to America is to not let the media begin to sexually exploit kids. My advice to Britney is that she has the rest of her life to be objectified, she should at least wait until she is old enough to vote.

The age of enlightenment

Blink and you missed him.

Self–help guru and all–around good guy Palden Tiatsu breezed into the Valley to dispense wisdom and granola treats to the huddled masses of people trying to answer the question, "How can I be a better person?"

A rising star on the self–help scene, Tiatsu has counseled countless Hollywood stars, including Charlie Sheen and... Martin Sheen. And hey, if Hollywood says it's good, then I'm hoppin' on that train. Normally, I'm not one for the whole self–help scene, but I figure I'll give anything a shot that will keep me off of the "happy pills" that are becoming more and more of an option.

Mike Messaros

The flyers said Tiatsu was going to be in Northampton over the weekend, appearing at some run–down bar with "a husband and wife musical duo who write songs about the environment and not paying taxes." Sounded good so far. It went on to say that happiness was guaranteed to the first six people to show up. After that, it was a crapshoot.

So I showed up in Northampton with an open mind and a wallet full of money. Hey, happiness doesn't come cheap. And I was going to get happiness out the wazoo.

Tiatsu was a peaceful man, dressed strangely enough in a three–piece suit and sandals. He offered his hands to the audience invitingly, as the people stood and cheered. They were absolutely begging for the answer.

"I have something to offer, my friends. It is happiness."

The crowd went nuts. Yeah, this is what I came for.

"Where is this happiness? It's in here," he said, pointing to his chest (and gold chains). "It's in here."

"Happiness is like a bird on a tree. You must feed it."

Frantically, I scribbled this down in my notebook. "Bird... tree..." This was gold.

"And if the anger squirrel comes around, what do you say to the anger squirrel? You tell it to shoo! Shoo, anger squirrel and go find your own tree."

"Shoo," I wrote. "Tell the anger squirrel to..." Wait a minute. The anger squirrel? What the hell was I wasting my time on?

"Excuse me," I called out. "What is an anger squirrel exactly? Does it have sharp teeth? Is it carnivorous? Do I need shots?"

"My son, it is better to go with the flow than to doubt it."

"Go with the flow?"

"That's right, my son. Go... with the flow."

"But what exactly does that mean?"

"Well, it means that... that men are from Mars and women are from another planet. If they don't come to a common point in understanding..."

"What? That's the most pithy, ridiculous..."

"Uh, yeah. Hey — Free Tibet!"

With that, he was out the door. For a man in sandals, he could really make some speed. Unsatisfied, I left quietly out a back door, while an older man in the front row cupped his face in his hands. "Mars? I thought I was born in Palmer. Damn my parents."

So I wandered around the streets, trying to find the answer. What was happiness if I could not quantify it, buy it, or have someone else tell me what it is.

Later on, I ran into Tiatsu at Ye Olde Watering Hole in Northampton. He was swaying over the jukebox, trying to decide if he was going to use his last selection on "Free Bird" or "Slow Ride."

"Yeah, I like to, like, brew my own beer. At home," he said, nodding his head. "Boy, that gets me satisfied. When I come up with just the right beer flavor. Yeah. That's life."

I nodded too.

"I like this place, this valley," he said. "The people here, they believe in a lot of stuff. Like water–diving and aromatherapy. I thought towns like these only existed, in like, The Music Man and that stuff."

I nodded again.

"The thing is, all this self–help crap, I don't even know what I'm doing. My name isn't even Palden Tiatsu. It's John Wayne O'Brien."

"I figured as much. It was the ruddy cheeks and general Celtic looks that give you away."

"The funny thing is, I don't think many people caught on. Hey, free Northern Ireland."

"You got it, brother."

Merritt wows Smith crowd

THE MAGNETIC FIELDS
Davis Ballroom — Smith College
April 8

NORTHAMPTON — As usual, University of Massachusetts students had to leave campus to see a great show. And this show may have been the best of the semester — almost two hours of classic Stephin Merritt melodrama.

As he took the Davis Ballroom stage, Merritt looked completely out of place. The ballroom was decorated like a high–school gymnasium mixer, complete with a revolving disco ball and large red and gold foil banners. It was hardly his preferred tiny, smokey club venue, and the first thing he did was light a cigarette and take a swig of Sam Adams.

Moreover, you could almost hear the audience, full of the Northampton indie fashion elite, gasp as he took the stage wearing a brown plaid flannel shirt, khakis and worn brown Dexter moccasins.

The evening was jam–packed with 27 songs, sampled from every album including side projects the 6ths and Future Bible Heroes. Susan Anway's soothing, melodic voice on the Wayward Bus and Distant Plastic Trees albums was replaced by Merritt's sweet, sad brooding bass. He sang the crowd favorite, "100,000 Fireflies," as well as songs from Get Lost and Holiday that included some of the best lyrics in the business: "I saw you standing in the airport with your Chihuahua in your hand crying on the moving sidewalk on your way to Disneyland," ("The Flowers She Sent and The Flowers She Said You Sent").

The highlight of the evening, however was when keyboardist Claudia Gonson ran off–stage to go to the bathroom and Merritt, acting oh–so–suave, stepped down to circulate among the mostly–seated crowd. In typical dork fashion, the microphone was tangled in the sound equipment and the song was halfway over before Merritt freed himself.

But while Merritt was adorable in that short, mopey and dopey let–me–tell–you–about–my–misery sort of way, second opening act The New Harmful was cute in that look–at–us–we–are–so–cool–and–poppy sort of way.

The New Harmful looked like a candidate for Sassy magazine's Cute Band Alert. They had all the elements to make the indie girls in the audience swoon — good–boyish looks, dorky black Buddy Holly glasses, and skinny red ties. Not to mention a rockin' female bassist. Mmmm–hmmm.

Unfortunately, they lacked the charm and originality to carry the look into a successful act. And that, coupled with continuous circuit breaker and sound problems, made for an awkward set. The group did show potential in the last two Tullycraft–esque songs, however. With a little maturing, they could become a fresh new Valley sound.

The first opening act, Olive Grain, provided a taste of the Fire and Water to the indie hipsters. The two–member group was an experiment in both instrumental and vocal sound. The guitarist took a bow to the strings of his electric guitar to create sounds that were at times mesmerizing, at times painful, while the singer accompanied with wordless operatic vocals. It was perfect atmospheric music for a low–key night at home, but not too engaging live.

Tromeo remixes Shakespeare

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

English Professor Richard Burt, Elizabeth Burt and director Lloyd Kaufman (from left to right) were on hand last Thursday to introduce Kaufman's film Tromeo and Juliet, a controversial take on Shakespeare's classic love story.

If anyone wandered into Herter 227 last Thursday expecting some romanticized vision of Romeo and Juliet, they probably left after the extreme close–up of a nipple piercing was shown.

If only they had stayed a bit longer, they could have seen the penis monster.

Lloyd Kaufman, director of Tromeo and Juliet, was on hand to introduce the film, in addition to showing a trailer for an upcoming Troma feature and sign copies of his book All I Need to Know About Filmmaking I Learned from the Toxic Avenger.

The studio, which is celebrating its 25th anniversary this fall, is the country's oldest continuously–running independent studio.

Introduced by English Professor Richard Burt, Kaufman detailed his thinking behind turning one of Shakespeare's most recognized plays into such an irreverent film.

"For many years, Troma has been giving the cultural world the bird," Kaufman explained. "So we decided we should give it the Bard."

He went into a more detailed, if questionable, explanation, saying that on a visit to Stratford–upon–Avon, "the Bard's spirit entered my body," prompting him to make the film.

Kaufman also revealed Shakespeare's deathbed wish to "rewrite Romeo and Juliet and put in a three–foot penis monster."

And there it was, for all to see on the Herter Hall screen: a three–foot penis monster, showing up as a symbol of Juliet's growing anxiousness regarding men. Also showing up in the movie were close–ups of nipple piercings, lots of nudity, ears being pulled off, and the immortal line, "I'm gonna jerk off in my hand and swish it around in the punch bowl."

Not to mention Lenins from Motorhead as the narrator.

Kaufman went into detail about the production, revealing that a lot more went into the conception of this movie than just a bunch of guys sitting around coming up with lines about desecrating punch bowls.

He explained that the Troma team was highly influenced by George Cukor's 1936 version starring Norma Shearer and John Barrymore, saying that the "stylized version of Cukor was 'in to our yang.' He also said that all of the actors have had extensive background in Shakespeare.

The movie was greeted with enthusiasm by the appreciative audience, which laughed all the way through Kaufman's admittedly wandering speech into the movie.

Memorial Week activities designed to fight racism

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Students hand out yellow string bracelets yesterday to spread an anti-hate message across campus.

To honor the memory of the Holocaust and educate the University of Massachusetts community about hate crimes at large, students will be running a series of programs throughout this week.

The Jewish Student Union's Holocaust Commemoration Committee along with the Baker, Chadbourne and Greenough Residence Area, annually creates programs for Holocaust Memorial Week at the University, and Yom HaShoah, Holocaust Memorial Day.

"To get the whole campus together to stand up against racism," the committee began distributing yellow string bracelets on the Campus Center Concourse yesterday, Vickie Bragg, committee chairperson, said. Bracelet distribution will continue throughout the day today.

A campus-wide remembrance service will be held tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union at 7 p.m. A "diverse" group of speakers, including members of the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender community and the African-American community, will speak against discrimination, Bragg said.

Tomorrow, the committee is sponsoring a discussion, "Hate Crimes: The Community Responds," which will be held in the Colonial Lounge in the Student Union at 7 p.m. The program will feature a speaker from the Not in Our Town Coalition, a group actively opposing hate crimes which works to educate communities on the effects of hate crimes. Jimmy Tarr, of Hatfield, will share his experience as a victim of a hate crime, and explain the community response to such crimes.

Holocaust disconnection

Chanel Dubofsky

I was a morbid child. My Barbie dolls experienced their fair share of car accidents, broken marriages and familial traumas. I read paperback novels about beautiful young girls dying of terrible diseases, and went to the library day after day searching for more.

My sixth-grade year was consumed by The Diary of Anne Frank, the newest book I had found in my excursions. The confused adolescent inside me reached out to Anne; she was bookish, frustrated and misunderstood. I wanted to find out everything I could about her, and soon another obsession ensued.

By the end of sixth-grade, I had educated myself about the Holocaust. While my friends in the next town, which had a sizeable Jewish population, learned about it in a series of classes, my own middle school did no such thing. I read every book in the library and memorized numbers, dates, cities and names of the camps. But somehow I always found myself turning back to Anne, reading about her concerns over clothes, school, friends and boys, relying on her to remind me that we were not so different, and that she really had existed.

At the same time, as I obsessed about the Holocaust and sought more information, I became rapidly disinterested in Hebrew school. Judaism was something that I could take or leave, it had nothing special to offer me, it simply meant that I had Chanukah instead of Christmas. Ironic, how I bonded to an event that resulted in the partial destruction of the Jewish people and yet I rejected the possibility of learning more about the religion as a whole.

Yom HaShoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day) poses a problem for me. When I made the decision to become a committed Jew, I found myself less and less able to identify with the Holocaust. I have been to the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., seen the piles of shoes and stood inside the cattle car used for transportation. I did not cry.

When Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated, I felt as though it had taken place in my family; I was inconsolable. I have never been to Israel.

Our generation of Jews is often depicted as being either proud and proactive, or disconcertingly apathetic. There is little room to exist in between. The proactive portion spends its time trying to engage those who aren't, pointing out what is empowering about Judaism. With this goal in mind, the Holocaust is hardly something we would mention.

How then can we educate and prevent without turning away? Can our generation ever feel as though we are connected to the Holocaust so that we take an active role in combating anti-Semitism? How do we proudly "own" our Judaism and accept a history of oppression? How do we go about answering these questions? Perhaps a beginning to finding an answer lies in the simple and profound words of Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress: "Hope, not fear."

Relief efforts need contributions

Challenging campuses to contribute to relief efforts aimed at Kosovo refugees, several organizations have begun nationwide campaigns to collect funds and supplies.

United Jewish Appeal (UJA) Federations of North America has established a national open mailbox to collect money which will go directly to the established Kosovo Refugee Relief Fund, according to Andrew Weitz, the UJA University Programs Northeast Field Representative.

Checks should be made payable to the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) Disaster Relief Fund and can be taken to the University of Massachusetts Hillel House, from where they will be mailed. Or they can be mailed directly to UJA Federations of North America, University Programs, c/o Kosovo Refugee Relief Fund, 111 Eighth Ave., Suite 11-E, New York, N.Y. 10011-5201.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee has also created a fund. To contribute to this relief effort, checks should be made payable to JDC and marked Kosovo Relief. Checks can be taken to the Hillel House or mailed to JDC, 711 Third Ave. 10th Floor, New York, N.Y. 10017.

The American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), a Quaker organization including people of various faiths who are committed to social justice, denounces both the use of military strikes by the U.S.-led NATO forces and the ethnic cleansing of Albanians in Kosovo. AFSC is collecting emergency kits, composed of 6 candles (four to eight inches long, not dyed), one bath-size bar of soap, one box of bandages and one tube of triple antibiotic ointment, to be sent to Kosovo.

Kits should be sent in clear plastic bags, along with the name and address of the person sending the kits and five dollars per kit, to the Kosovo Relief Fund, AFSC Development Office, 1501 Cherry Street, Philadelphia, Pa. 19102. Five dollar checks should be made payable to AFSC- Kosovo Relief Fund.

The Holocaust as a reality

Renee Cohn

I was asked to write an editorial about my experiences in Poland on Holocaust Remembrance Day. I'm always excited to share stories and lessons from my trip, but I realize, as I draw up mental pictures from that summer, that it's not as easy as I thought.

Before I went to Poland, Holocaust movies, pictures and artifacts disturbed me to no end.

I ran hysterically out the exit door on a class trip to the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., I had to leave the theater during "Schindler's List;" I cried through history class when we studied the Holocaust in school.

Now, people wonder why I have become so apathetic, why I can watch the films, see the pictures, look at the artifacts behind the glass, and not show emotion. It's because I've been there.

I went to six concentration camps in eight days, in the cold rain of Poland in the summer of 1997. Before the trip, we had to read novels, write papers, watch movies and have a sort of group therapy to prepare us for what we would see, but nothing prepared us for what we saw. No one told us we would walk through barracks and see human ashes and piles of hair and shoes, or walk into crematoriums and gas chambers.

The camps are a little too real. Other than at Auschwitz, there is no glass between you and the camp. Birkenau is just there; no guards, not even mowed grass. You just walk around freely, wondering if anyone is working to preserve it at all. Maidanek, conserved, is the most startling of all. There is a barrack filled with all kids' shoes, a mound of human ashes in the back and a room of "ovens." If you read that sentence and feel a lump in your throat, know how you feel.

Maidanek, Auschwitz, Birkenau and all the rest stand as testimony to the Shoah (Holocaust). Some people argue that we should tear them down and allow the world to move on. But I can't agree with that sentiment. There are people who deny the Holocaust, and have been doing so for decades. Barracks of shoes are not a hoax; rooms of human hair are not manufactured; a chamber of false limbs and one of only eyeglasses — they're not forged. They stand as a sickeningly real reminder of the darkest part of human history.

I can't help but draw a parallel to world issues. Holocaust Remembrance Day exists for the precise reason that we can't afford to forget what happened; humanity cannot afford it. But it doesn't work to just remember it, we have to learn from it. The Holocaust is not about the Jews, it's about human beings, and whenever our fellow man is suffering, it is our job — as Americans, as college students, as people—to step in. If we don't, who will?

Never again. Iamais plus. Leolam lo. Nunca mas. Nie wieder.

Jewish unity threatened

Hayyim Rothman

As an Islamic studies major, I try to bring whatever lessons I can from Islam to my fellow Jews. Muhammad's goal was to unite Arabs of different tribes into one Muslim Umma, a religious community based on common faith. We have a similar concept in Judaism of Klal Yisrael, one Jewish religious collective. However, unlike the Muslim community, the Jewish people are losing our sense of universal solidarity.

This solidarity is being broken by the segmentation of Jews into denominations. Each denomination has its own synagogues, newsletters, private schools, social circles, rabbinical school and bureaucratic elite. Frequently, children growing up in theoretically diverse Jewish communities seldom meet other kids outside their section of the Jewish community. While I commend the American Jewish community on our organization, I fear that its fragmented nature will continue to separate us.

While different Jewish organizations have, and continue to, work together on joint projects, there is increased partisan bickering as different groups battle for prominence. Despite a new effort to form a united board of rabbis, it is a small and unpopular venture. Antagonism is growing between the Orthodox movement and the other movements, and competition is increasing between the Reform and Conservative movements.

Using the movement names creates artificial boundaries which seriously divide our community. We are commanded to love every Jew unconditionally, so his or her affiliation, if any, should remain irrelevant. Jewish thinker Simon Jacobson explains, "I may disagree with another Jew's behavior or choices, but I never disagree with the person. I embrace him as my brother, both of us children of G-d."

The division of denominations does not encourage us to seek group unity. In truth, our Jewish unity mirrors the unity of G-d. We are one nation, with one G-d, one land, and one Torah. This idea is the sense of the Umma concept. We need to refuse to allow politics to divide us.

G-d does not use our sectarian movement names in the Torah to refer to us. We are the B'nai Yehudah, the Jewish people. We are also the B'nai Yisrael (children of Israel), the Am Segula (treasured people) and the Mamlechet Kohanim (kingdom of Priest). These are our true names, which unlike the denominational names, have existed since we became the Jewish people 4,000 years ago. It is time we reclaim our G-d-given names, which reflect the unity for which we need to strive.

Another problem with ascribing each Jew to a movement is that we assume that each Jew agrees with the ideology of his assigned movement and its official decisions about Jewish law. Additionally, the movements tend to have political affiliations and connotations. Most of us cannot be described by a narrow world view and are, in fact, influenced by ideas from all the movements.

How can we combat the growing strife? In the last five years a new category has appeared on Jewish demographic surveys. I am referring to the "Just Jewish" box, which Jews are checking off with increasing zeal. The surveys reveal a growing movement of Jews who are refusing to be neatly filed away under a movement affiliation. Locally, a new multi-dimensional school in Boston reflects the push toward more unity. It is called the New Jewish High School and has appropriately acquired the nickname of "The New Jew."

Next time you meet a Jew and are confronted you with the usual, "So, what are you?" think twice about the full implication of your answer. It is time that we return to the Umma, to the Klal Yisrael we really are.

This editorial was inspired by "Was Moses Orthodox?" an article by Simon Jacobson, as well as the ideas of Rabbi S.F. Weimer and Hannah Braune.

No end: Development shows as knowledge

Hayyim Rothman

The holiday of Pesach has just ended, and now we are in a period called sefirat haomer, the counting of the omer, which extends until Shavuot, the next major Jewish holiday. It is a custom among many communities to read portions of a tractate of the Talmud (the major book of Jewish law and life) called Pirkei Avot (the sayings of the Fathers) ever Sabbath during the omer.

This tractate is basically a compilation of wisdom, condensed into short sayings, expounded by many great rabbis. This week, the second chapter is read. I have chosen one quote from it to present, to open the doorway to a source of great wisdom.

Rabbi Tarphon used to say, "It is not incumbent upon you to complete this work, yet you are not free to nullify it."

We all have goals in life, so many goals. There is so much to learn, so much to be done, so many people to teach and be taught by. The task sometimes seems unbearable. Sadly, we find that in the face of its immensity, many of our peers never even begin, hampered by the concept "don't start what you can't finish," which is imposed upon us from before we can remember. But life is not only about attaining goals, it is about the growth we achieve in striving for them.

Moreover, the purpose of a goal is only to engage us in the development leading up to it. As any true artist can attest, the allure of art is not in the completed piece but in the process of creating it; the finished work is a body which encloses the passion, devotion, meaning and labor which lead to that completion and truly constitute the soul of that piece.

Additionally, an artist also understands that even if the final piece does not meet his or her expectations, even if it is never finished, it is not a failure. Artists learn more from mistakes than from successes because it is through those mistakes that they learn how not to make them again, and thus work more efficiently and beautifully.

Likewise, in life, most of our time is spent striving toward goals, not arriving at them. With perspective we can learn to savor the striving, for it is this striving which gives our life meaning, gives our goals meaning. Similarly, even if we are unable to accomplish a goal we have set out to do, or do it in a less than perfect way (though our hardest try), there is no reason to be discouraged. It is through these difficulties that we learn best how to become wise people, good people.

Rabbi Tarphon follows the statement quoted above by saying, "If you have studied much Torah, much reward will be given to you." He does not say, "If you have studied all of the Torah." Also, the term "much" is extremely vague, there is no objective "much." Therefore, this statement must be referring to a personal "much," meaning that each person learning to the best of his or her capability will reap great benefit.

Again, the emphasis is on engaging oneself in the process, in an individual way, more so than on completing an objective general goal.

Throughout scripture, the Jews are enjoined to "know G- d," this is one of our national goals. Yet there is a question. "How can a human, a finite being, completely "know" something infinite (G-d)?" The answer is that one cannot. Why then have we set impossible goals for ourselves? The answer is found in the quotes from Rabbi Tarphon: We can never finish the task; we are not supposed to finish it! There is always more to do. There is a difference between "fact" and "truth," facts are found in textbooks, they are lifeless, they lie dead on paper; truth is something lived, experienced, It Is infinite.

We constantly take part in this experience; this is the "knowledge of G-d" in the scripture and the "work" mentioned by Rabbi Tarphon, not a lifeless definition, but a life-filled state of being with no beginning and no end. Therefore, we are not expected to "complete" it, coming to a final resting place of truth, for in ceasing to strive for it we nullify it. Mistakes are a part of this experience too; if it were not for the sins (mistakes) of Israel, the prophets would never have risen to teach us, and their teachings have helped us in our journey. It is through our mistakes that we learn better how to travel.

The ultimate goal is by design unattainable, this state is true spirituality, true strength: understanding and living in the knowledge that "knowing the infinite" is accomplished by knowing that we can never "know," there is no end, and every goal is only a means of keeping us moving.

Experiencing infinity is accomplished by becoming one with the constant flow of it, not by trying to capture it or define it. And we undertake the journey, every journey, understanding that at each ending we will be faced with the same sublime conclusion "I don't know," because every answer leads to more questions. "I don't know" is the expression through which we experience infinity, G-d, and thus Chassidic teachings relate that "the highest level of knowing is not knowing."

Special thanks to Yehoshua Ellovson, whose thought forms the foundations and in many cases the specifics of most ideas related in this editorial.

Bryan leads way for UM

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, with the haze of a New York City afternoon taking shape, the Massachusetts women's outdoor track and field team competed in the Columbia Invitational. The meet hosted some of the elite programs in the Northeast and when it was over, UMass showed why it ranks right with these schools.

The Minutewomen were led by Rose Bryan, who found herself victorious twice. The senior finished first in the 100m hurdles with a time of 14.87 seconds and the triple jump with a jump of 11.58 meters. Both of these performances make her eligible to compete in the New England Championships.

Bryan was also a member of the 4x100m relay team that secured first place for the second straight week. Raqueil Shelton, Abby Rubino and Shelanda Irish completed that quartet.

To go along with her first place finish in the 4x100 relay, Irish placed first in the 100m dash in a time of 12.87 seconds. This time earned her a spot in the New Englands.

Senior Nicole Way picked up a first place finish in the 1,500m with a time of 4:37.41, which meets New England qualification standards. Along with Way in the 1,500, was Kristin Clsowski, who captured third, which qualified her for New England's as well. Sarah Thoms came in seventh.

In the 10,000m, Lizzie Sheptyck placed first with a time of 39:17.70. This was a personal best for her, bettering her old mark (set last year) by more than two minutes.

"Overall, I'm pleased with the performance. We can build on it for next week," LaFreniere said.

Not be overlooked were the other strong performances that were turned in by Minutewomen. Jamie Hedgecock took first place in heat two of the 100m dash and second place in heat two of the 200m.

"She had a great day," said Assistant Coach Elizabeth Zimney. In a career that has been plagued with injuries Hedgecock showed the form that she is capable of.

"It's the best I've seen her run since freshman year," LaFreniere said.

Senior Melanie Bell placed third in the long jump and Rubino placed fifth. In the throwing events UMass fared better than a week ago. In the javelin, Sharyn Harrison placed second and Nielle Giffune placed fifth, showing improvement over last week's performance. The shot put saw UMass finish third and fourth behind throws from Carole LaPlante and Alison Tostevin, respectively.

The Minutewomen also captured third in the javelin when Giselle Nicholas threw 40.56 feet.

In heat three of the 800m, Sara Saba placed first. In heat two of the 100m hurdles, Leah Dwyer placed third. Kate Toye finished third in heat two of the 100m dash showing great improvement over past performances.

Crew recovers second place

By Chris Spring
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's crew was back in action Saturday and Sunday as it took to the waters of Cooper River in Camden, N.J. Unfortunately, things closed on a sour note Sunday afternoon as the varsity eight team was beaten badly by No. 2 Virginia.

The Minutewomen managed to pull out second place by finishing in front of the Villanova squad. UMass was ranked No. 6 heading into the race and hoped to make a statement by upending the Cavaliers. Slow conditions, fatigue and Virginia all helped to erase those hopes.

Coach Jim Dietz was sorely disappointed with his team's performance. "We got spanked. All across the board, we got spanked," he said. "The river has hurt us, we haven't been able to practice the way I'd like to, but you can't make excuses."

UMass rowed a time of 7:38.4 behind Virginia's 7:20.2. Villanova brought up the rear finishing in 8:02.2.

On Saturday, the varsity four squad rowed to a first-place finish in 8:23.6. They were followed by Robert Morris (8:30), the UMass B squad (8:41.4) and Duquesne (9:41.9).

One thing that Dietz was pleased with was Saturday's showing by the junior varsity eight team in a varsity race.

"The JV raced well in the varsity spot on Saturday. They were facing a Villanova lightweight group and eight of their nine members were on the lightweight championship team last year," he said.

They finished second with a time of 6:56.6 compared to Villanova's 6:49.5. Finishing in back of UMass were Fordham (7:05.2), Delaware (7:10.9), Connecticut (7:23.11) and Pittsburgh (7:26.5), all of whom raced their first varsity squad.

UMass won in both novice races. The first novice won in a race that featured sixteen boats. The second novice rowed to victory by defeating the Dukes. Also, the UMass lightweight eight boat came in second to Villanova.

On Sunday, the second varsity eight race mirrored the first one with UMass (7:48.4) finishing second behind Virginia (7:22.6). The second novice eight race also brought the same results, with Virginia finishing in 8:06.1 compared to UMass' 8:41.2. The UMass first novice eight placed third (8:29.4) behind Virginia (7:58.3) and Villanova (8:15.5).

On Saturday, the UMass lightweight eight team saw their first action of the year in a special lightweight eight invitation race. Unfortunately, they finished a disappointing fifth (9:06). Princeton won in 7:54.8 followed by Villanova, Virginia, Radcliff, UMass and Cambridge at Oxford.

Women's tennis hosts Rhody at home today

By Matt O'Neill
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team will begin Atlantic 10 play when they host the University of Rhode Island today at the Upper Boyden Courts at 3 p.m.

The Minutewomen come into the match against the Rams riding a three-game winning streak, having beaten Fairfield, Colgate and St. Bonaventure.

Coach Judy Dixon feels that Rhode Island is a great way to open up the conference part of the season.

"This match is important to us because they are an A-10 foe," said Dixon. "The Rams came in ninth in the conference last season, so they are a great way to begin this year's conference play. We have to be aware of all the conference matches, so we can't overlook anyone this year."

The Rams' No. 1 and No. 2 singles players are the strength of this year's team, according to Dixon.

"They have a fairly competitive No. 1 and No. 2 players," Dixon said. "But after that, their lack of depth starts to show."

UMass is heavily favored in this match because of its heavy advantage in depth over the Rams.

"The fact that they don't have any depth will play into our hands," Dixon said.

Because of URI's lack of depth and the fact that the match will be at home, Dixon is going to juggle parts of the line- up to get some playing time for all of the players.

"We're going to use the same singles line-up as the Fairfield match," Dixon said. "But, I'm going to try to change up the doubles groups a little."

The changes will most likely be using the same first and second doubles teams, but Dixon will try to play Gillian Kane and Michelle Kuhr at the No. 3 doubles slot.

"I'm going to try to get Michelle in at the No. 3 spot with Gillian because she's a local kid," Dixon said. "Growing up in Longmeadow, It would be great for her to play in front of a home crowd."

This will be one of the few home matches for the Minutewomen this season, so Dixon would like to see a strong showing from her team.

"It is good for us to play at home because we have a good group of fans who support our program," Dixon said. "We usually play well at home, which is great because almost everyone usually gets some playing time."

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may feel as though you're being overactive" today, even when you are doing the bare minimum. Assignments come at you from all sides.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You can expect some financial assistance today, though you may not recognize it for what it is at first. Keep facts and figures straight.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You'll be hardworking and on-target throughout much of the day. It may surprise others that you're willing to do so much without any kind of break.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Someone knows how to bring out the best in you today and at the best moment. You should pay attention to what he or she has to say to you.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may have to deal with more than your share of mundane issues today. You're the only one in a position to recognize when certain things must be done.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Communication on all levels is likely to be more difficult for you than usual. You may feel as though you're speaking a foreign language at times.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be called upon to follow someone else's path throughout much of the day in order to figure out what went wrong before it's too late.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You're going to have to be quite multi-faceted throughout the day, capable of doing a variety of different things all at once.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — There may be a delay in the transfer of messages during the first part of the day. Later, you'll have to work doubly fast to "catch up."

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — It's time to "grin and bear it" one more time today, thanks to a "friend" who doesn't know that he or she is encroaching on your territory.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Love is likely to take a more prominent position in your life at this time, but you mustn't make the mistake of thinking that it is risk-free.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You're eager to experience something new and exciting today, but you mustn't go so far out of your way that you permanently risk a current project.

Men's track takes 2nd at Spring Invitational

By Erik Haan
Collegian Correspondent

If you haven't had the chance to check out the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team this season, the time is now.

The Minutemen kicked off their season in winning fashion with a second-place finish at the University of Pennsylvania Invitational. They continued that trend this past Saturday, storming out of Storrs, Conn. as the front-runner of the Connecticut Spring Invitational.

Senior Tom Toye

This time, however, UMass featured a more balanced attack. First-place finishes were few in the previous victory, but prominent in the more recent drubbing UMass gave its opponents. Among those topping the charts were Ben Baraldi, Tom Toye, Dan Leboeuf, Marc Sylvander, B.J. Cardoza and Vic Morency.

Morency continued his domination of the field, as he won once again a double-winner. Both his discus throw (178- feet-06-inches) and his javelin toss (212-feet-03-inches) were record-setting performances. That extends his streak of breaking records this outdoor season to three meets, dating back to the Florida Relays.

Matching Morency as a double-winner was senior Tom Toye, who was victorious in his fights for the top spots of the 100m and 200m dashes. Toye scored a time of 10.71 seconds in the 100m dash, beating out teammate Adrian Zullo by eight one-hundredths of a second. His time of 21.38 seconds in the 200m dash was more than enough to earn him 10 points, as his closest competitor fell 0.23 seconds short.

Despite not being double-winners, the other first place finishers for the Maroon and White had impressive showings as well. Dan LeBoeuf ran a time of 1:57.09 in the 800m, Marc Sylvander won his event with a time of 49.24, Ben Baraldi outran his competitors with a time of 14.62 In the 110m hurdles, and B.J. Cardoza out threw everyone in the hammer toss with a distance of 182-feet-08-inches.

Despite the fact that UConn, which coach Ken O'Brien thought would be his toughest competition of the year, sent about a dozen of its best athletes to another meet, the win was still a meaningful one for the Minutemen.

"[Boston College] is tough... and Holy Cross is also," said O'Brien, who was elated by the fact that his team was able to take 262 points. He credited both Toye and Morency with "outstanding performances," but also stated that the "jumping performances paid big dividends."

The Minutemen make their way to Dedham this Saturday, when they will take on Brown, Dartmouth and Northeastern.

UM water polo breaks even

Minutewomen drown Harvard and Bucknell at ECACs

By Lawrence Redford
Collegian Staff

This past weekend the Massachusetts women's water polo team posted a record of 2-2 at the ECAC Championships. The Minutewomen played against Princeton and Bucknell on Saturday, and wrapped up the weekend on Sunday against Harvard and Maryland.

In the first game on Saturday, UMass went head-to-head with the Princeton Tigers. UMass had posted a win over the Tigers earlier this year, so Princeton was looking for revenge. UMass found itself down 2-1 at the end of the opening period. The Minutewomen could not recover, only scoring three more goals to fall, 7-3.

UMass was looking to bounce back in the late game against Bucknell. Jumping out to an early lead, the Minutewomen never looked back. They went up by four goals at the close of the first period. Katie Grogan lead the team with three goals in the victory. UMass eventually won, destroying the Rams, 13-5.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen faced Maryland early and Harvard in the night cap. The Maryland game was a battle from the very beginning. The teams were tied at zero when the first quarter closed. UMass increased the tempo, scoring three goals in the second while the Lady Terps could only manage two. Going into the final period, UMass was up 4-3. The Minutewomen came up short one goal as Maryland scored two.

At the end of regulation the teams were knotted at five goals apiece. It took two overtime periods to settle the draw, as UMass was on the losing end of a 6-5 game. This game included an excellent performance from freshman goalie Megan Thomas.

Thomas has played exceptionally well all season, and deserves high praise for her efforts in net. She has notched a career high 10 saves.

In the final game against the Crimson, UMass ended on a positive note, dismantling Harvard by the score of 14-3. The duo of Claudia Clement and Grogan each had a hat trick, leading the Minutewomen to victory. Again, Thomas was a large part of the victory, stopping nine of the 12 shots by Harvard.

While the Minutewomen had a less than impressive weekend, dropping to 21-6, they are still undefeated in CWPA competition. This weekend will be very important for the team, as the Minutewomen travel to Boston for the New England Championship Tournament. UMass is the defending Eastern Division champion as it looks to defend its title in the approaching weeks.

Men's tennis drops two matches

By Seth Szilagyi and James Piehl
Collegian Staff

It was another disappointing weekend for the Massachusetts men's tennis program, as it lost two matches and was rained out in the third.

Heading to Villanova, the men seemed to be on a roll. They were humbled, however, falling 5-2 to the well- rounded Wildcats.

"We can't go out with those type of expectations," said coach Judy Dixon of the loss. "Our intensity was less than 100 percent."

The lone bright points for the Minutemen were the play of senior Todd Cheney and Rob Manchester. Both picked up victories with wins over Stephen Smith and Paul Moore, respectively. Cheney and junior teammate, Bo Navarro, were also victorious in their doubles match, 8-4.

"Todd played senior tennis all weekend," said Dixon, "He gave a full effort and tried to spark the team."

The Minutemen moved on to play Atlantic 10 rival Dayton. The men played a tough match, but eventually fell to the Flyers, 5-2.

"We were pumped and ready to go. The loss really put a knife in our hearts," said Dixon.

Sophomore Bill Greener continued to impress with a 7-5, 6-3 win over Scott Brammer. The win brings the walk-on's record to 4-2 as the No. 6 singles man.

In a especially tough loss, Navarro went down to Steve Thompson, 6-4, 2-6, 7-5.

"Bo was cramped from dehydration. He was literally crippled from the pain," said Dixon of the heart displayed by Navarro.

The normally reliable Rob Manchester took a loss to Brad Nykell, 6-4, 4-6, 6-4, while No. 1 man Steve Prisco lost to Pete Tabernik, 6-0, 6-1.

The standout of the match once again was the senior, Cheney. He beat Jeff Keckly, 6-2, 6-3, while also winning his doubles match with Navarro, 8-4. The doubles victory puts Cheney as the all-time leader at UMass for doubles wins.

"He's played well almost all year and he's finishing up beautifully," said Dixon of her senior.

The Minutemen were looking for a victory to finish up the weekend at Temple, but instead they found the rain, as the match was suspended due to the storm.

Now the Minutemen must regroup and try to focus on the postseason.

"The breaks aren't going our way," said Dixon. "As a team we're sick of losing."

Dixon hopes to play Dayton again in the championship tournament and change the outcome.

The Minutemen are in action again, against the University of Hartford, Friday at 3 p.m. on the Upper Boyden Courts.

UM men's gym gives it its best shot as it finishes seventh at the NCAAs

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

Last weekend, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team brought its season to a close with a seventh-place finish (225.250) at the NCAA Eastern Regional in Champaign, Ill.

Ohio State took the first-place spot (231.100) with a narrow victory over the second-place finisher, Michigan (231.050), and Penn State rounded out the top three (229.550). All three teams will travel to Nebraska in two weeks, when they will compete in the NCAA National Championships.

This was the first time in school history that UMass had ever made it to Regionals, and despite a seventh-place finish, the team enjoyed the overall experience and was pleased with its performance.

"We did awesome," said coach Roy Johnson. "We were kind of nervous going into the meet because we had to start on pommel horse, but we went 6-for-6 and the guys put out some of their best performances of the year."

The Minutemen racked up a total of 38.125 points on pommel horse, their highest score of the season on the event: a strong finish for UMass, but not enough to overcome the more-experienced Big 10 schools.

Although the squad didn't finish within the top three spots, one Minuteman pushed his skills to the limit and earned a spot at NCAAs. It should be no surprise that the man is junior Jeff LaVallee, the backbone of the gym team.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

LaVallee scored a 57.550 in the all-around, while finishing fifth overall on the still rings (9.750), seventh on the high bar (9.650), eighth on the pommel horse (9.725). He also placed 13th on the floor (9.575), 12th on the parallel bars (9.500), and grabbed a 9.350 on the vault. The Olympic hopeful had the second highest score in the all-around of the individuals not on the top three teams.

Although LaVallee placed among the top gymnasts at the meet and advances to Nationals in two weeks, he was not the only Minuteman to give good performances and bring in the high scores.

Senior Stephen Pryor finished 14th in the all-around (55.150), while scoring a 9.55 on pommel horse, 9.20 on floor, 9.40 on both rings and vault, and a 9.35 on the parallel bars.

Seniors Phil Lieberman and Dan Young tied on the vault (9.30), while Young muscled his was to a 9.25 on rings and Lieberman tumbled his way to a 9.45 on floor while earning a 9.40 on high bar.

Sophomores Bryan McNulty and Andrew Leis posted some impressive scores, as McNulty finished second for the Minutemen on floor (9.55) and took the blue ribbon for UMass on vault (9.55). Leis finished second for UMass on high bar (9.45) and third for his team on pommels (9.50).

Also among the top finishers for the Minutemen were sophomore Mike Alexander, who tied LaVallee on vault (9.35), and sophomore J.J. Hershey, who had a solid performance on pommel horse (9.35).

The Minutemen have come to the end of a long, four month season, in which virtually every school record was broken. All-around highs, team event highs, and individual event highs have all been broken this year, UMass won ECACs and made its first-time-ever appearance at NCAA Regionals.

Check out the rest of the rest of sports coverage on page seven. Find out what's happening with the women's track and field, crew and tennis teams.

Women's gym finishes season

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

After four long months of gymnastics competition, the end of the road has finally been reached for the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team.

This weekend the team finished fifth in the NCAA Region Five Championships. Their score of 190.275 was not good enough to qualify for the national championships.

UMass was paced by Jill Fisher, who finished fourth in the nation last year on the floor exercise. Fisher's score of 9.850 was tops until the final rotation when Penn State's Ellen Casey edged her out by .05 points.

"Jill was a real bright spot because we weren't able to utilize her this year," said coach Dave Kuzara. "Here is a person who came in fourth in the country last year who did a great job at this meet and almost won it [again]."

Junior Mandy Mosby

Despite struggling in the vault event, Massachusetts had strong performances on the balance beam. Anita Sanyal recorded a 9.800, followed closely by her teammate Mary Moore, who posted a 9.775.

"We did a great job on beam," said Kuzara. "We finished [the meet] on beam at a time when we already knew that we couldn't qualify for nationals. Our beam team had no falls and was a real bright spot. We finished strong and took second place [in that event]."

For the second meet in a row, junior Mandy Mosby finished first for the Minutewomen in the all-around exercise. Her score of 37.575 was good enough for 10th place overall.

"Mandy was real consistent throughout the day," said Kuzara. "She was our top all-arounder once again and she obviously performed well for us."

Reflecting on the past season Kuzara pointed to the depth in his rosters as one of the most impressive aspects of the 1999 season.

"The highlight of this year was that we utilized our whole team," said Kuzara. "Our depth is what qualified us for regionals. We used 13 different people this year. There are so many people who contributed. Michelle LoPresti was solid all year. I can't say good enough things about Michelle."

LoPresti finished behind Mosby in the all-around, coming in at 15th place overall with a score of 37.575. Senior Jenn Pokrana concluded her UMass career with a showing of ninth place on the uneven bars routine. The two-year reigning A-10 uneven bars champion scored a 9.775.

Despite the fact that the 1999 campaign has come to an end, Kuzara is confident that the future holds promise for the UMass program even though the team is losing a handful of seniors.

"We have a great recruiting class coming in," said Kuzara. "We have a really good core of gymnasts remaining. We are so excited about the future."

One of the reasons that Kuzara is so optimistic is that of the seven losses suffered this year, three of those losses came to teams that have not finished competing for the season. Alabama, Michigan and Stanford all won their respective regions.

"It was a tough year," said Kuzara. "We learned a lot and that will make us a better team. We had to fight and battle and this will help us become a stronger team, but we need to take it to the next level."

Kuzara feels that this can only be accomplished by knocking off an upper echelon team next season.

NASSS programs states low funding a problem

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Amid a search for a permanent director, students have raised concerns that the Native American Student Support Services (NASSS) program is being marginalized.

During protests to the recent revisions in the admissions policy, students who use NASSS said the program is underfunded, the interim director is paid less than other directors and the staff is overworked, among other problems.

Joe Marshall, assistant vice-chancellor for Enrollment Services, and direct supervisor of the NASSS director, said the program's problems are primarily due to University-wide budget constraints and that it is a fledgling program.

The program's funding is a primary concern for Interim Director, Renee Lopes-Pocknett. The $70,000 the program receives a year covers the operation of the program and salaries of the three staff members including the director, who is on a lower pay-scale than other support program directors.

NASSS, which offers its advising services to all students, serves approximately 70 students, 10 percent of which are non-Native American students. It is staffed by a full-time director and a part-time graduate student and undergraduate student.

The "money is for three years to create a program. Of course it's not enough to do everything we need to do," Marshall said. "There is never enough money."

"In my understanding,[it is] because we don't have larger numbers [of students]," Lopes-Pocknett said of the director's lower pay scale. "[But] we have double the work."

But Marshall said the number of students is not what drives the director's salary or the program's funding. He said the program is still starting up so it does not receive the same level of funding as larger, established programs.

"The funding was agreed upon before I got here," he said. "It depends much less on the number of students [than the fact that it is new.]"

Starting the program was a result of a student take-over of the administrative Goodell building in 1997.

Lopes-Pocknett said NASSS has the same amount of work as larger programs because Native American students do not come from one culture. She said students' needs are as varied as the tribes and nations they come from. She said for example, some tribes and nations are federally recognized and some are not. Also the groups some students come from do not necessarily support them getting outside education.

Marshall said he is aware of the amount of work the staff puts in, especially because the program is just starting up.

"It's extremely time consuming. There are a million details," Marshall said. "I could not be more supportive. I really believe in this program."

"I would probably do it every semester," said Amy J. Stephenson, NASSS academic advisor and graduate student who said she gets paid for 20 hours of work a week but actually does 30-40 in addition to teaching a class. "It's really for the students. It's hard to see them struggle."

Marshall said he was able to find some additional money for the program this year and would have to come up with "creative" ways to get more in the future.

Lopes-Pocknett feels while attempts have been made to help the program, there is "power dynamic" that administrators don't understand.

"I think they really believe they're being supportive... [but] the administration doesn't get the power dynamic here... in early February we asked for information [from the Registrar] we desperately needed for the program [that came recently]. If Joe Marshall said to the registrar get X. They get X."

"I probably don't," Marshall said in response to Lopes-

Seniors celebrate with ball

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Graduating seniors should get their dancing shoes ready for the Commencement Ball which will take place on May 21 in the Student Union. This is the second year in a row that the graduates will be given a ball.

According to Anne Thompson, the assistant director for parent and student programs and an advisor to the Student Alumni Relation Society (STARS), the Student Union won't look the way students are used to seeing it. "[The Student Union] will be completely transformed, you won't even recognize it. The trees as you walk in will be lighted and there will be park benches," said Anne Thompson.

STARS will be sponsoring the event. They are known for holding various events on campus, such as the Day One Fun Fest, they give incoming freshman welcoming packages, and they also sponsor daffodil days.

The extravaganza will begin with cocktails and hors d'oeuvres at 7:00 p.m. in the Colonial Lounge, where the Doo Wop Shop and Six Minutes will be preforming. Dinner and dancing will be held in the Student Union Ballroom. A buffet will be set up in the Cape Cod Lounge, and there will be three cash bars set up for students over twenty-one. "In the main ballroom there will be dancing and a general hoopla," said Anne Thompson. The Student Union Ballroom will open at 8:00 p.m. and students can dance until 1:00 a.m. in the morning.

During and after dinner in the Cape Cod Lounge students can enjoy the sounds of a piano-man. According to Anne There will be festivities taking place outside as well; horse and carriage rides will be given

Serbs, Albanian troops skirmish in N. Albania

By Tom Cohen
Associated Press

BAJRAM CURRI, Albania — Igniting fears of a widening conflict, Serb forces pushed into northern Albania on yesterday, fought an hour-long skirmish with Albanian troops, seized a border hamlet and torched homes before withdrawing, Albanian officials and International observers said.

With Albania a major staging ground for NATO forces, even yesterday's incident — short-lived, small-scale, with no reported casualties — brought a warning from Washington that Yugoslavia would make a grave mistake in expanding the fighting.

In Belgrade, Yugoslav officials denied any incursion into Albania. The chief of the army information service, Col. Milivoje Novkovic, said on state television that Yugoslavia's defense of its own borders was "being fabricated as an alleged invasion." Albania, in turn, said the Serb push into its territory would carry consequences. Sokol Gjoka, an Albanian Foreign Ministry official, said his country would take necessary steps to defend itself, "in close coordination with our allies."

These days, that means NATO, which has taken over Albania's airfields, airspace and military infrastructure. In coming weeks, a force of Apache attack helicopters and thousands more allied troops will be based in Albania.

White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said Washington had received "credible reports" of a Serb incursion, as well as past instances of Serb forces crossing the border or shelling Albanian territory. "If (Yugoslav) President (Slobodan) Milosevic seeks to widen this war, it will be a great mistake," he said.

The warning came as NATO moved to more than double its air armada. In Brussels, Belgium, the supreme allied commander in Europe, U.S. Army Gen. Wesley Clark, said he had requested 300 more U.S. aircraft as well as additional air power from other NATO allies.

In Washington, President Clinton said nearly three weeks of NATO airstrikes are "diminishing and grinding down" Milosevic's military capabilities.

Air raid sirens wailed in several cities across Serbia late yesterday, those in Belgrade sounded around nightfall and shortly before midnight.

SOM offers students free tax service

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

For students pulling their hair out over getting their taxes filed by Thursday, the Isenberg School of Management at the University of Massachusetts is offering a free tax filing service.

Student volunteers are offering free tax assistance to local residents at the Hampshire Mall in Hadley and to UMass international students, faculty and staff at the Isenberg School of Management.

The service is made possible by the Volunteer Income Tax Assistance (VITA) program organized by Michael I. Whiteman, visiting associate professor of accounting and information systems.

"Most [students] are undergraduate accounting majors who have studied tax law and see VITA as a way to obtain valuable practical experience in the field," Whiteman said in a press release.

Through participating in the program, SOM students receive one credit for their work and students overseeing the project receive three credits.

Senior accounting major Neil Dennehy says the experience benefits everyone.

"I think it's a big help for the students," Dennehy said. "It's a big help for us too because it helps to give us a real- life situation that we wouldn't get inside the classroom."

This isn't the first time the tax service has been offered. However, now students are able to operate from a computer- based system and use programs to print the tax forms for the customers.

Patricia Flash, an graduate student from Canada studying speech pathology, feels the service helps people like herself who are filing taxes for the first time in the U.S.

"This is my first time filing taxes in the U.S.," Flash said. "They [students] have helped me figure out what's important to put for deductions and what forms to use."

"The Isenberg School of Management's department of accounting has offered the VITA program for the past decade as a way to help the local community and to give students experience in dealing with a wide range of issues facing tax payers and tax professionals," Whitman said in the release.

Free tax service is available tonight for domestic students from 4-7 p.m. in the Hampshire Mall Community Room. Service is also available tonight from 5-8 p.m. for international residents in Room 111 of SOM. Services will also be offered Thursday night from 4 to 9 p.m. at the post office on University Drive.

Political Science department discusses Kosovo crisis

The University of Massachusetts Political Science Department will be holding a "teach-in" about the Kosovo crisis today.

The teach-in will be held in Campus Center Rooms 174- 76, from 2:30-5:00 p.m. Six political science professors will be speaking about different aspects of the crisis, ranging from the war-making capabilities of President Clinton to the role of NATO. There will also be question-and-answer and discussion periods following the lectures. Various hand-outs, including historical information, maps and contemporary articles, will be made available to those in attendance.

"The purpose [of the teach-in] is to extend what is supposed to be our professional expertise and training to educate ourselves and others about this crisis," said Professor Nicholas Xenos, who helped organize the event.

According to Xenos, many political science professors will be cancelling their afternoon classes today to allow their students to attend the teach-in.

Fellow professor MJ Peterson, who will be speaking about the international laws related to the crisis, worries about public ignorance regarding Kosovo.

"My sense is that most of our students know very little," she said. "They don't know the locations of things. They don't quite understand the extremely complicated ethnic inter-mixing in the region. They don't know where Kosovo is in relation to the rest of Yugoslavia and other countries."

Professor James Der Derian, who will speak about the military strategies being used, stressed the importance of the Kosovo incident. "It involves not only American troops, it also involves America's prestige," he said. "It also involves ethics — whenever you use force as part of your foreign policy, it raises the question of whether its an ethical and practical application of it."

Students unable to attend the teach-in can access information about Kosovo on Der Derian's website at http://www.umass.edu/polsci725/main.html

UMass students gather to commemorate Holocaust

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

A number of members from the University of Massachusetts campus community came together last night for a memorial of the Holocaust and to reflect on the past and future of Judaism.

The group of about 40 gathered in the Cape Cod lounge of the Student Union, where Allyson Hopkins, a freshman education major, in charge of the memorial, gave an introduction and brief background of the Holocaust.

Hopkins pointed out that Jews were not the only ones murdered, but gypsies, homosexuals, those with handicaps and other groups were also targetted by the Nazis.

"All those who were considered enemies of the state were banished," she said.

Rabbi Adelman of the Chabad house tried to bring inspiration to the Jewish community present saying — "as Jews, we need to strengthen ourselves and our Judaism. We need to move forward in areas that distinguish ourselves as Jews."

Adelman further spoke of a story he heard where a person said that "every Seder should have an empty seat to remember the dead." However, he said, "better yet, go find a Jew and fill that seat."

Adelman said that today, Jews are experiencing a different Holocaust in that they are drifting away from their own faith.

David Arfa, program director of Hillel House, told a story of Jews in a concentration camp, trying to celebrate Hannukah using whatever materials they could find. For example, black shoe polish was used for oil.

As a Rabbi in the camp began saying the prayers to a small huddle of people around him, someone said "How dare you? [rejoice in a time like this.]" The Rabbi said that he was troubled, but "when I saw the men leaning forward, so expectant, then of course I could."

"If [those victims of the holocaust] did not have that hope, they would have all perished," Arfa said.

"Where does our source of hope come from in times of despair?... I have no answer, but I'm offering that you think about it," Arfa said.

Members of the Jewish Student Union (JSU) read poetry about the Holocaust, such as Alexander Kimil's "A Creed of a Holocaust Survivor" and Lois E. Olena's "Ghosts on my Bookshelf."

Adding to the ambiance were candles lit in remembrance of the dead and singing by the Hillel House acapella group, Kolot.

Afterwards, a mourner's kaddish was spoken, Dan Kapner, a sophmore Japanese and Judaic studies student, said the "Prayer for the six million victims."

In closing, Vikki Bragg, chair of the Jewish Student Union Holocaust Commemorative Committee, reminded the audience that hatred and acts of atrocity toward other people still exists today — citing the situation in Kosovo.

"We have to stand up for that, too," she said.

Bragg also reminded the audience about a discussion the committee is sponsoring, "Hate Crimes: The Community Responds," to be held in the Colonial Lounge in the Student Union tonight at 7 p.m.

Kate Geyer is the financial manager of Pride Alliance, a GLBT organization on campus.

Between answering telephone calls and talking to students, running the Pride Alliance keeps Kate Geyer's schedule full.

Geyer is financial manager of the Pride Alliance, the Gay Lesbian Bisexual and Transgender organization at the University of Massachusetts campus.

Geyer, a senior philosophy major, is a mentor to younger queer students here on campus through the Pride Alliance, which offers information to interested students.

As a transfer student, who has attended both UMass- Lowell and UMass-Boston, Geyer's perspective on the homosexual community is unique.

"UMass-Dartmouth is this little homophobic school, and the gay organization — BiGayLa, only has at best, about 15-20 members," Kate said. "That group was really about it in terms of 'out' students at that school, and even those students didn't always come out."

Geyer also felt that, "UMass-Boston was a commuter school, without much sense of community. So I'd have to say that Amherst definitely has the most visibility of the UMass campuses."

Despite her work at helping homosexual students on campus, Geyer said she has experienced homophobia at UMass. "The biggest example of homophobia that I have seen here on campus was the word 'patchlickas' scrawled above a girls door in my residence hall. I taped a letter to the editor that the girl had written onto my door, and it was ripped down."

Kate feels that becoming a member of Pride Alliance helps a lot of students develop community with other queer students and come out of the closet. "Coming Out Day and Queerfest definitely improves visibility on this campus, and help students both directly and indirectly."

Geyer said she also has experienced disputes over homosexual issues with the Republican Club over their affiliated newsletter The Minuteman, which Geyer says is filled with homophobic comments.

"The entire newspaper is a poorly written inflammatory piece of rubbish meant to stir-up racist, sexist, homophobic feelings," Geyer said.

Geyer said she experienced problems with The Minuteman staff when she put up flyers denouncing the organization. "Yeah, it said racist, classist, sexist, homophobic bigots. Paul Ferro called me and accused me for 'criminal mischief' and is charging me $105 for 35 copies of The Minuteman he says I took."

Geyer said she was told that the first copy of the newsletter is free, but if you feel the need for more papers, they will cost you $3 per copy. Geyer, who does not plan on paying the fee said, "I did not take the papers and would not read them for any purpose but comedic enjoyment."

Geyer is presently working on two major challenges right now. One of which is finding students to get involved with Pride Alliance, since all but one steering committee member are graduating. "It is important that students get involved if they want the Pride Alliance to exist next year, because with all of the seniors graduating, the new officers will not know how to run things."

The other challenge for Geyer is planning Queerfest, a celebration of gay pride, which will take place all day on Thursday April 29, followed by a dance in the Campus Center auditorium that evening. "We still need volunteers for the day of Queerfest, and students belonging to RSO's are invited to table. It should be a lot of fun, and a great way to meet people."

Environmental justice discussed

By Veronica MacDonald
Collegian Staff

Environmental justice, the fight against pollution of sites that are poor, violent and colored by a disproportionate scale, begins in the community with the acknowledgment of social, scientific and technological factors, according to Patricia Hynes, professor of environmental and public health at Boston University.

In a discussion and slide show entitled — "Environmental Justice in Practice," Hynes spoke about the current issues involving public health and pollution. Hynes says that the movement of workers from agriculture to industry through history has shaped the environment and health of cities. One example Hynes used was discovering that areas with high levels of lead in childrens' blood are the same areas with the highest numbers of hospital emergencies for childhood asthma. In the past, red lining from banks in cities prohibited blacks from purchasing suburban homes. Forced to live in concentrated areas run by absent landlords, the buildings were eventually condemned or burned because of emittance of lead into the soil.

Hynes has been a member of several pilot programs in the Boston area that focus on lead contamination in the hopes of becoming a model for urban centers. Hynes said, "we access social conscience, social health, social knowledge... in order to come up with solutions."

Hynes received help in her efforts to improve urban areas from the Environmental Health Protection Agency as well as from health centers and garden centers. In addition, with the help of the community and outreach workers, she found inexpensive ways to improve the outside environment of houses in areas like Dorchester and Roxbury.

On a more optimistic note, Hynes said solutions have been found for some of the problems, such as soil lead contamination. Bare soil paths covered with inexpensive walking stones or mulch, advocacy of such projects in neighborhoods and a web site are all ways soil lead contamination are being corrected.

Another urban problem is vacant lot spaces which were traditionally places for drug dealing and midnight dumping of illegal hazardous waste. Cooperation between block agencies or senior citizens, volunteers, and grants have turned these spaces into aesthetic community gardens for purchase or donation to shelters and hospices.

"Environment for Justice" was organized by Stacey Douchette, a UMass environmental science major with a concentration in women's studies who feels that people must combine factors "to solve problems and see the big picture." The talk was also co-sponsored by the UMass Department of Environmental Science, Environmental Institute, College of Fine Arts and Humanities, College of Food and Natural Resources, and the School of Nursing.

Pocknett's statement, as he said he can't be at NASSS everyday. "I'm sure she's right."

Lopes-Pocknett's original contract ended in December but she has stayed on, extending her contract until a replacement could be found.

"My family relocated to Cape Cod. [I drive back] every weekend," she said. Lopes-Pocknett stayed with friends in the area for over a month before being able to get an on- campus apartment. "I'm very committed to this program."

The director's search is "very long and tedious," Marshall said but he hopes to have the new director chosen from the search committee's recommendation within the next few weeks. But the new director may not be able to start right away and Lopes-Pocknett said she does not plan to renew her contract again when it ends this month.

"Once the program gets established and [we] get a director in, then I'll be able to get the resources necessary to make the program a success. I want this program to be a model program," Marshall said, adding that he will work to get the new director in quickly so students aren't left hanging.

But despite the problems, students appreciate the program.

"I didn't have a support system [before finding the program]," said Minnie Goodblanket, an undeclared freshman and daily visitor to NASSS. "For myself I kind of hang out here."

Considering that last year was the first Commencement Ball the University of Massachusetts ever held, the turn out and feedback were great. Organizers are expecting this year's event to be even better. "It was great last year, everyone had a really great time and we got a good response," said Marnie Thompson, co-chairperson of the Commencement Ball.

Anne Thompson hopes that the Ball starts a new tradition at UMass and a good time is had by all. "There is an absence of celebration here at UMass. People need to feel good about their school and this is one way to do it. We're hoping to maximize the place and that people have fun."

Serbia early today, cutting power lines connecting it with the surrounding area, state media said. Several other cities in the region were also targeted, but there were no immediate reports of damage.

The Albania border clash, by the account of international monitors watching from nearby, began when about 50 Serb infantrymen advanced on lightly manned Albanian border posts early yesterday afternoon.

The frontier has long been an active arena for the rebel Kosovo Liberation Army in its battle against Yugoslav forces.

Listening in on the Albanian border police radio frequency, international monitors say they heard police urgently ask Albanian soldiers stationed a few miles away what to do. They were told to stand and fight, but soon reported they were surrounded and retreating.

Simpson held at gunpoint in parking lot

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — O.J. Simpson wrestled and bit a gunman who tried to rob him yesterday in the parking lot of a golf course, police said. Simpson was cut on the hand during the attack. Simpson chased the assailant in his car while calling police on his cellular phone, but gave up because the man was running red lights and police told Simpson to pull over.

Nobody has been arrested, said Officer Jason Lee, a spokesman for the Los Angeles Police Department.

Simpson, in a phone interview from home with The Associated Press, called the incident at Los Feliz Golf Course "the weirdest thing."

"I had finished playing golf and was walking to the car saying goodbye to my buddies," he said. "I was taking my shoes off between cars and I sensed someone coming up behind me. I turned around and he was holding a gun on me.

"I said, 'Man, why do you want to screw up your life? Take my car. You don't want to do this.'"

He said the man looked at him and called him by his name, saying "O.J., I hear you carry a lot of money."

The assailant seemed intent on robbing him, Simpson said, but when he offered him money and his credit cards, he didn't take them.

The name's Bond... James Bond"age"

There's no way you can deny that porn has somewhat evolved from the James Bond movies.

C'mon, there was a female character named "Pussy Galore." And what about "Holly Goodhead?" Then there was "Octopussy." Who's next, "Ms. Tunsa Tiddie?"

Sean Connery had his share of lines with sexual innuendoes, but the crown goes to Roger Moore. He's said more dirty things than Ron Jeremy and Peter North combined, and his movies aren't even rated R.

Aaron Saykin

If you don't believe me, just watch The Spy Who Loved Me. At the beginning of the movie, Bond is in bed with a beautiful woman in Austria. Of course, he is summoned for a mission by Her Majesty's Secret Service while he's just starting to get it on. The British Minister of Defense orders Bond to "pull out."

By film's end, Bond is in the process of passionately strip searching a female Russian spy whose name happens to be "Triple X." Coincidence? I don't think so. Anyhow, "Q," who is really a horny old man, spots Bond in the sack and asks him what in God's name he's doing. Bond replies:

"I'm keeping the British end up."

Do you ever wonder where the term "Bondage" comes from?

Not that it bothers me one bit, but there is so much dirty talk and sex in the Bond movies. Double O7 should have dropped dead from a STD years ago, but they couldn't do that to him. Just imagine Bond taking time to put a rubber on, and then speaking his words of charm:

"Oh Pussy, dear, I've had lunch, but not dessert... by the way, I have genital herpes. But don't worry, Q whipped me up this great drug to repress them. I only have to take it twice a day. There are, of course, dangerous side effects, but I am a dangerous man and can handle them. I am often afflicted with headaches, dizziness, and secretions of puss."

"... Oh James! Take me now." [as she leads Bond to the shower]

That guy has bathed with more gorgeous women than Hugh Heffner. It's a known fact that 007 is the most famous porn star to walk to the earth.

But not only that, Bond turns down amazing females left and right. In one movie, there was this busty Italian girl who had that look of lust for him in her eyes. But he behaved, and remained monogamous with Triple X, who was also well endowed, if you catch my drift.

What's great about the older Bond movies is that people weren't so uptight about those things back in the 60s and 70s. Bond didn't have to be emotionally sensitive. Connery used to whack girls on the rear end left and right. Moore took the more subtle approach, and always had a bottle of champagne ready. And he would inject with the occasional "It's for the good of the mission."

If non-stop sex is a requirement for the British Secret Service, then sign me up. I could handle a good STD every now and then. At least it means steady sex.

So I've decided on what I want to be when I get out of school. I want to be a smooth-talking British agent. The English accent won't be too tough. I'll be over there for six weeks this summer, and I can impersonate almost anyone. If I have any trouble, I can ask Professor Antonsich. He has the best British accent I have ever heard. He could actually be the lost Bond. I bet he's an agent stationed in Amherst by British Intelligence to protect the life of Chancellor Scott (who could probably use some extra protection these days).

As far as the agent part is concerned, well, I guess I could pretend to be an agent. Would anyone really know for sure?

Bond never carried any ID. He just had his Walter PPK, and that watch which could do anything from steering a car to printing a fax. So I'll just walk around the world in an expensive suit and say to women, "The name's Saykin, Aaron Saykin. I'm British, and I'd like to show you how firm I am."

I would let my friends come along, of course. This kid I know from back home named Bernie would be no trouble because he never tries to have sex with girls. He's more of the sensitive type. Plus he can't hold his liquor. I'd be off drinking martinis — shaken not stirred — and Bernie would be puking all over the place. Not to mention the fact that he has an uncanny knack for passing out in a swamp of his own vomit whenever he's in Clinton, Connecticut.

Prairer would be like laws. He's 6-foot-3 and weighs 300 pounds, plus he'll eat just about anything. He even eats beer cans, and with a little work, I can have him eating steel chains in a couple of weeks.

My buddy Webber would have to be a bad guy — somebody like Mr. Scaramanga with the three nipples. As it is, we call him "The Enemy of the State." He wouldn't be much of a criminal, though. For some reason or other, he's always getting caught by the cops for destroying something while he's drunk.

Kevin would be that little midget that follows Scaramanga around. You know, the little guy from Fantasy Island who always yelled "the plane, the plane."

Uncle Danny would be Deputy J.W. Pepper. He's a big, heavy guy who likes to kidnap you and drive around, pretending he's on a secret mission.

My pal "the chef" would be Goldfinger. I'll let you figure that one out for yourselves.

I, of course, would be the Bond of the group. I'm more of a Timothy Daulton type, though — not much personality and not much sex either.

It would be one hell of a time if I were Bond. Even the ugliest woman in the movies, Money Penny, looked good for a little while... but she got old and wrinkly by the time Roger Moore was on the job. He didn't look so young either by the time he called it quits in '85.

And what a glorious way to end your reign as Bond — in the shower with Tonya Roberts. But these days, I bet Moore couldn't fire a pistol if someone cocked it for him. There's a sexual innuendo for you.

Tales of a freshman

In just a few short weeks, I will have finally completed my freshman year here at UMass. Sure, I've still got to figure out which building in the visually stunning section of Southwest I want to live in next year, and I'm sure I'll break my phone a few more times during the course of pre- registration, but hell, bring on the summer and start calling me a sophomore.

The past year has changed me more that I could have ever imagined. After a slow start, I now consider myself to be pretty familiar with what it takes to survive here at the Zoo. Here I offer my list of freshman year discoveries in no particular order. I'm sure that my fellow members of the class of 2002 will agree with my observations, and hopefully the upperclassmen will look back with a fond feeling of nostalgia. This is what has made my freshman year an unforget table one.

1. The "freshman fifteen" is real. OK, I think we all arrived here in September promising ourselves that we weren't going to put on weight and give our high school friends something to talk about during winter break. Well, that's a little easier said than done. Between going to classes and doing homework, I rarely find time in my all too busy schedule to hit the gym. Regardless of what I keep telling myself, curling Bud Lights on the weekend is not a valid bicep exercise.

It also doesn't help when a regular main course at the DC is Beef Stroganoff, which forces me to live for weeks at a time eating the "world famous" Stone Willy's Pizza, and stuffing my face with fries (By the way, DC staff: what the hell is Spanokopita?!)

You fitness nuts out there will probably tell me that it is no one's fault but my own for my present beer gut. You know what? You're right, but it's just a hell of a lot easier to blame someone else for my fall from grace.

2. Avoid Health Services at all costs. First of all, if you think that your illness is serious enough to warrant a checkup from our on-campus doctors at UHS, I'll save you a lot of time and energy and tell you exactly what they're going to tell you:

"It's just a cold and you should go home and take it easy for the next few days. Do you have any cold capsules or ibuprofen?"

No one I know has ever gone to Health Services for an illness and not been given this diagnosis. I went there twice this year and both times I heard the same thing. Granted, these people are professionals, but it would have been a lot easier to hear had I not grown a beard in the lobby while I was waiting.

There is nothing worse than sitting in that lobby reading about the 1997 World Series in the most recent Sports Illustrated that they have while you feel like your head is going to explode.

3. Invest in a pair of sandals. (Or flip-flops- if you prefer). Have we all heard the story around the dorms who liked to walk up and down the halls in his bare feet and eventually contracted a staph infection like the one that killed Bob Marley? True, it's probably a stupid urban legend, but it's better to be safe than sorry, and the importance of a pair of sandals should not be underestimated. Who knows what kinds of germs live on the hallway floors, and you shouldn't be in college if you're crazy enough to go barefoot in the showers.

For twenty bucks, you can pick up a pair of those slip-on Adidas sandals. You'll combat germs and you'll score points in the fashion department. So what if everybody's got 'em? That kid with the staph infection sure didn't.

4. Always drink before a frat party. If you're heading to a frat party that promises multiple kegs of beer (only for students over 21 of course), you might want to set yourself up with a few cases before you go out. The line at most frats is miles long and feels like a sauna, and you probably don't have the kind of patience it takes to get a buzz at a crowded frat.

I do have a friend who only has to wait in that line once and still gets pretty drunk, but unless you're my boy Andres, put some down in your room with your friends before you go, and then backpack to the party. Sure you're gonna pay a couple of bucks for the cover anyway, but at least you won't be that guy who complains that "he's gonna leave" all night because he refuses to stand in that line again. Plus, you tend to not care so much about the crowded dance floor when you show up feeling pretty nice already. Besides, you'd be surprised at what some girls will do to avoid standing in line for another beer. Believe me.

5. Study, study, study. Some might argue that this should have been number one on my list. Let's face it, with all that goes on around campus, it's easy to lose focus of the reason that we're all really here: to get an education. I'm completely serious when I say that I did absolutely no homework my senior year in high school and still graduated as an honor student. It completely blew my mind when I found myself writing a paper practically every night last semester. No one said that college was going to be easy, but no one said that it would be so stressful either.

Remember, the phrase "work hard, play hard" holds no meaning unless you actually do the first part. So, this semester, I began managing my time a little more effectively and actually got some pretty good grades. The college workload is a big adjustment from the breeze of high school, but it's definitely not impossible.

Well, there it is: just a few things that I learned (sometimes the hard way) during my freshman year here at UMass. I'm sure that many of you made the very same discoveries when you first arrived here at the urban metropolis that is Amherst. It's been one hell of a ride so far, and I'm thankful that I still have three years left.

I have made a lot of new friends and I am happy that I made the decision to come to school here. Who cares that it's in the middle of nowhere and that our best station is TBS? Wait a minute, that's a different story altogether.

Take a stand

Ah, spring: when a young chancellor's thoughts turn to thoughts of privatization.

"Wouldn't it be nice," he thinks, "if those independent businesses were gone from the Campus Center and replaced with much more profitable corporate businesses? Besides, I'm sick of that Bluewall place anyway. It's just a hangout for those lazy students. They just sit there and study! Sometimes they don't even buy stuff! How is that making the University any money?"

Ah, here we go again. Privatization. The final frontier in the administration's screwing of the student body and the surrounding community. Yet another example of the administration of our fine university ignoring the voice of the students who help pay their salaries, and just as in other administration/student conflicts, those in power will have the final say.

Let's face it — there is absolutely no reason (from their perspective) that Billy Bulger, Chancellor Scott, or any other member of the administration of this school should care about what we have to say. Money is their primary concern, and it is money that is the real motivation behind the decision to privatize the Campus Center. Our protests are nothing in the face of the millions of dollars that corporate franchises will pump into the University.

Paul Martinez

What's that? You read in the Collegian that the decision hasn't been made to privatize? You heard that the school is paying a consulting firm eighty grand to decide whether or not they should go through with privatization? The reality is that the choice has already been made. The consulting firm — probably run by some member of the Board of Trustees' former frat brother — is a smokescreen. Hell, even if they aren't, are you really going to tell someone who handed you a check for eight thousand dollars what they don't want to hear?

The people who work in the Campus Center know the truth. Have you noticed the ah "Spring Hours" that the Bluewall and Coffee Shop are running under this semester? While it might be nice to think that the managers of these businesses are simply giving their hardworking employees a bit of free time to enjoy the nice weather, don't be fooled.

The reason for these reduced hours is that these businesses — which employ many students as well as people from the surrounding communities — are being phased out. They will be gone by next semester, or if fate smiles down, by next spring. In their places will be a Burger King or a Starbucks. Students from the University will not be given priority for jobs, and the jobs they do get will pay less than the ones they have now.

"Students from the University will not be given priority for jobs, and the jobs they do get will pay less than the ones they have now."

What gets me though, is the fact that there are many people who work in the Campus Center — tending bar or serving food at the TGC, working the grill at the Coffee Shop or running the checkout at the University Store — who will lose their jobs. We, as students, often have something else to fall back on: parents, the fact that many of us live in dorms, etc. Many of the people who work at the Campus Center do not. Most of the people beyond college age who work at the Campus Center do so as their actual job (maybe as one of two or three, but these jobs do provide a source of income that many cannot do without). What about them?

Will you sit back and let corporate America screw the blue collar worker again? Or will everyone who reads this column send an e-mail to Chancellor Scott at "dkscott@chancellor.umass.edu" and tell him exactly what they think of his plan? Oh yeah, be polite and articulate. Save the cursing for when you see him in person... if you ever do.

Letters to the Editor

Frascella has no "Grounds for Complaint"

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Matt Frascella's article, "Grounds for Complaint," printed on April 7, 1999. While Mr. Frascella may have legitimate complaints about the bongos and the grounds at UMass, I was disappointed to find that he has confused humorous, effectual opinions with offensive ones.

First, I have some advise for him. If he doesn't want to see the ladies' hairy legs, maybe he shouldn't look. If he is unable to control his gawking, though, I have a proposal. If he promises not to wear the tank tops he loves so much, thereby saving us from the experience of his hairy, sweaty, male armpits, then just maybe those hippie ladies would be grateful enough to shave their legs for him.

Furthermore, I'm interested to know where Frascella gets his information about UMass grounds crew. Hillbillies? Idiotic? How does he know? Did he do a study? Has he looked at the University's demographic information on employees? Oh wait, I know why Frascella's an expert on sophistication — he appreciates Colt 45. Yep, this affinity for cheap 40s definitely proves he's cultured enough to call others hillbillies. And speaking of Colt 45, where does he think all the bottles in the pond come from?

Finally, I'd like to wish Frascella luck in his search for the Swedish bikini models — though if he doesn't cover up those hairy armpits, I doubt they'll pay much attention to him.

SI For Women struggles to define own personality

Last year the fuss was over ESPN's The Magazine. Would its flashier, wider photos and sick-with-stats mode compete with the thought-to-be all-encompassing Sports Illustrated?

Early results say "yes," it is doing just fine, thanks. A subscriber to both, I fancy SI's in-depth features of WNBA point guard Jamila Wideman by Gary Smith, but I also appreciate The Magazine's farther from mainstream sports coverage and recent in-depth study of "the fro," a quirky article that staunch SI would never even consider.

Now Sports Illustrated has made the latest move, pawning a popular idea and slapping it with its own name brand, Sports Illustrated For Women, which hit newsstands this spring with less fanfare than the zipper.

Women have long accounted for racking up the sales in magazines, earlier options being Good Housekeeping and Vogue. The more recent trend has nodded to magazines like Shape and Self magazine, which boast articles that focus on women's health and diet.

As a subscriber to Shape, I have always felt that a great way to help more women gain knowledge of sports would be to insert a section of professional and collegiate sports updates. You can imagine my surprise to find out that such a magazine could possibly exist in Sports Illustrated for Women.

I discovered the new magazine while reading the original SI. Admittedly, I was very excited. On the cover is a young African-American girl with the question, "Is She the Next Michael Jordan?" underneath. Thinking that it was a little premature to designate her before she even got her driver's license, I searched for more telling clues.

Scanning down I did a double-take at one of its features which read, "A Sports Horoscope For You (yes, you!)." OK, is this really necessary? For you Pisces out there, you should all consider getting a pedicure, if that's helpful at all.

Another headline on the cover lists "March Madness Preview — Everybody Loves Tennessee — Even Brandy!" Even Brandy! I knew she went to Kobe Bryant's prom but I had no ideas she was such a sports enthusiast.

I felt letdown as the initial excitement turned to downright disappointment. The high-principled masterminds at SI who have captured the respect of sports information-crazed fans for fifty years had given in to the higher gods of the "One simple move for a great butt" generation. Nonetheless, I felt compelled to buy it out of the sake of curiosity anyway.

Editor-In-Chief Sandy Bailey explained that they had sent out two trial runs last spring with great response (despite the backlash on cigarette ads, which they have since dismissed) and were proud to finally publish the first issue.

I opened up to a page in the middle and what do I find? — Information on what to carry in a makeup case for after practice. I'm sorry, but while it is a good thing to want to look your best, I think there are plenty of other magazines that already supply that.

To its credit, the ads are dominated by female models with athletic builds in non-too-skimpy sportswear, Slim-Fast (questionable) and a "Take Your Daughter to Work" promotion with Jamila Wideman and her father, UMass professor John Edgar Wideman as sponsors. These are definitely an improvement from Shape's Nikki Taylor swimsuit layout on every other cover. I began to feel my apprehension subside.

In true SI form, they had Faces In The Crowd, Short Takes and Go Figure (interestingly enough, the focus was on Massachusetts' Assabet Valley Girls Ice Hockey Association). Feel-good stories of an American Basketball League All-Star game organized by a season-ticket holder was admittedly inspiring. But what about the actually content?

You know what? It was pretty damn good. Although I disagree with making the cover girl a 14-year-old high school freshman phenom named Seimone Augustes from La., they'll learn. The most compelling article was of Cindy Stefanko, a runner for the University of Texas battling with skin cancer. Another article discussed UConn women's basketball coach Geno Auriemma's struggle for acceptance by the other female-dominated NCAA women's basketball programs. How's that for reverse discrimination?

SI For Women does offer some sound advice for the women's NCAA basketball tournament as well as information of women's collegiate tennis, softball and track and field, stuff that is ordinarily difficult to find other from specialized sports magazines.

In surprising retaliation of SI's famous swimsuit issue, a photo of hulking NFL Pro Bowlers dressed only in Hawaiian lams surrounded by surf boards is displayed on the last page.

On the whole, the magazine had solid, newsworthy articles, but I think if Sports Illustrated For Women wants to make a revolutionary statement (they were unavailable to comment), they should reconsider what to put in their own makeup case next time.

Is the movement lost? feminism needs help

In her article, "The Civil Rights Movement: What Good Was It?" Alice Walker argues that the most important element to insight — the true liberation of a group of people — is knowledge. She says, "Just 'knowing' has meant everything to me." Whether or not they gained anything else from the Civil Rights Movement, at least now African Americans can exist, contends Walker. This awareness or knowledge has also been a key gain of the Women's Movement. But as we move farther away from the height of the Movement, it seems that in some way this knowledge is disappearing; it seems that the objective way in which women previously were viewed and viewed themselves is on the rise.

If you have a conversation with the average American, it becomes evident that while people's attitudes have changed, they have changed very little. If you watch television or read a magazine in a somewhat analytical way, it becomes increasingly apparent how far the women's movement has to go. The oppressive roles that have been designated as male and female are still being maintained and perpetuated. In light of these realizations it is very disturbing to hear, not just men, but women say that the women's movement isn't valuable to them, now.

One woman said recently, "The area of women's studies just isn't important to me; it doesn't apply to my life." Although laws have changed, it takes many generations to fight the prejudices that are deeply rooted in people's minds.

As Walker suggests, there are still many injustices present in our society; this is true for both African Americans and women, but she says that Civil Rights Movement is not dead. In regard to the Civil Right Movement, Alice Walker wrote that "it is always the white man. . . who says that the movement is dead. . .because it no longer interests him." But, she claims that the movement sparked numerous changes and is still very much alive for black people.

The most disturbing thing about the women's movement is that it is women who are saying that it is dead. Walker says that equality for black people "no longer interests him [the white man] because he can afford to be uninterested; he does not have to live by it, with it, or for it, as Negroes must." If this is the case for the Civil Rights Movement, one must ask why do women not believe that the Women's Movement is still pertinent?

Walker agrees that the gains made by the Civil Rights Movement did not provide African Americans with everything they wanted, in fact she says, materialism "has provided them with precious little that they wanted. Walker claims that the most important gain made by the Civil Rights movement was self-knowledge and the right to exist; "If knowledge of my condition is all the freedom I get from a 'freedom movement,' it is better than unawareness, forgottenness, and hopelessness, the existence that is like the existence of a beast. Man only truly lives by knowing; otherwise he simply performs, copying the daily habits of others, but conceiving nothing of his creative possibilities as a man, and accepting someone else's superiority and his own misery."

Like Walker says of the Civil Rights Movement, I would agree that the Women's Movement has not accomplished all of its goals — materially and socially women are still unequal to men. But the Women's Movement did provide women with a women-identified knowledge. Of this knowledge Walker says, "Part of what existence means to me is knowing the difference between what I am now what I was then." At the height of the Women's Movement it seemed that this knowledge would change the face of gender relations forever. They were, for the first time, allowed to choose their own destiny rather than follow the roles that society had prescribed to them. But today, it seems that most women do not possess this knowledge or awareness.

In our society, there is only a mirage of equality, and it seems that everyone believes that it truly exists. Because of its hiddeness, there is a pervasive internalization of this Inequality; it has become a part of social and individual consciousness. Inequality seems to have gone underground and is out of firing range. There is no concrete evil to fight. Much of this inequality is glazed over by the guise of prosperity. Too many people are too comfortable with the little that they have gained. Most women are content that they are able to get jobs and make a good living, although they make significantly less money than men do. Women are still not permitted to fight on the fronts lines during a war, but most women would say, "who wants to put their life at risk anyway?" Because of this comfortable position, most women are unwilling to disrupt the status quo in order to address the inequality that is still so prevalent.

We are mesmerized by the impossibly perfect lives of the media. We are constantly being fed images of beauty and wealth that are virtually impossible to achieve by 99 percent of the population. These images of love and success make most people's lives seem boring and mundane, making us place these false ideals on a pedestal — something that we aspire to emulate.

Women still believe they are worthless without a man. We aren't able to see ourselves as beautiful, instead we are constantly being told that our lives aren't good enough. There is always something we can buy or take to make us feel better about ourselves. The effects of aspiring to achieve this false beauty and success is evident in the high rate of eating disorders, diet regiments, prescription drug addictions, and plastic surgery.

While many substantial and important gains have been made in the last thirty years, it can't be a good thing that the word "feminist" is now practically a curse. It is very frustrating, as a woman who deeply believes in the ideas of feminism, to be laughed at by my peers when I bring up issues of gender equality. I'm not really sure what can be done about this. But I think that Alice Walker's concepts of self-knowledge and self-awareness are a good place to start. As a group, women must reclaim their self-knowledge. Walker summarizes the benefits of "knowing" as the only means of truly "existing."

As a Movement, women need to shatter the "phony 'promises'" of our society "that have sucked away so many pitiful lives." We need to do more than emulate the materialistic and superficial values that are constantly being handed to us, so that we can truly live and be liberated.

Roe vs. Wade desion not solid; 26 years later still under fire

By Rebecca Sablo
Collegian Staff

In the early 1970's, a young lawyer argued her first contested case before the United States Supreme Court, subsequently securing the American woman's basic reproductive rights. The 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision stated that the right to privacy extended to a woman's decision to have an abortion.

Nearly 25 years later, the same lawyer, Sarah Weddington, spent Thursday evening at Amherst College urging young people to support the nationwide movement to keep abortions legal. "When I won Roe vs. Wade, I thought it was a decision written in concrete but now I realize it was written in sandstone," said Weddington.

Weddington began to fear for the future of Roe vs. Wade shortly after the 7-2 ruling which allowed states to begin restricting access to abortions. Currently, states have restricted abortions by means of enforcing parental consent, notification laws and waiting periods. Thirty states have some type of parental consent law and 11 states have a mandatory 24-hour waiting period before a woman is allowed to have an abortion.

Thirty-six states have informed consent laws which force women to hear lectures on prenatal care, fetus development, and adoption. In particular, currently debated legislation, if passed, will make it illegal for anyone but a parent to bring a minor across state lines for an abortion.

State restrictions are not the only infringements that worried Weddington. In the Supreme Court, the current ruling on Roe vs. Wade is equally divided among the justices. Three justices want to get rid of it, three want to keep it, and three want to place more restrictions on it. Weddington stressed that the future of women's reproductive rights and their decision whether or not to have an abortion is dependent on the next president and his or her appointments to the Supreme Court.

Weddington's concerns are not limited to state and federal governments. Weddington also addressed access within the community. There are currently fewer doctors doing abortions than ever before. Fewer medical schools teach abortion procedures and 20-30 percent provide no training at all. In addition, 86 percent of American counties do not have abortion providers. Weddington also touched upon the rising violence against abortion providers and women.

Weddington believes that the most effective way to keep abortion legal is by "speaking out as decision makers." In addition, she advocated for more education, urged supporters to join state NARAL (National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League) chapters, and encouraged participation in political demonstrations.

Weddington closed with a piece of advice for all when she said, "With Roe vs. Wade, I left my footsteps in the sands of time and whether they will be erased or remain permanent is up to you."

Weddington's work with women's issues originated from her own frustrations and conflicts surrounding commonly accepted limitations on women in everyday life. Shortly after graduating from law school, she took on the Roe vs. Wade case. Since the historic decision, Weddington has participated in Texas state politics and has worked within the Carter Administration. She currently practices law in Austin, Texas and teaches at the University of Texas at Austin.

Weddington's talk inspired and educated. In reaction to the historic account, Kim Palmer, an Amherst College sophomore history major said, "I realized how much I owe to women in the past. It is because of them that I can do so much now."

Dora Ferrari, a senior UMass animal science major said that the lecture "heightened my social awareness of reproductive rights."

Signals of an abusive relationship

This isn't intended to be an advice column, giving advice to others has never been my strong suit but I do have a story to tell. I am not writing this because I want sympathy. I am writing because I do not want anyone to travel the same road that I did.

When I was entering high school, I was nervous and excited. My excitement was enhanced by the thought of my new boyfriend. This was my first serious relationship. I found myself completely enthralled with him, and like most other young girls I spent all of my time with him, while all of my friends slowly drifted away. But that was okay, because I had Bill and he loved me.

Everything was wonderful and it had to be that way; I wanted this relationship to work. If I didn't have Bill, I had no one. When he began to tell me that he thought I was fat, I believed him. He loved me — why would he lie? I would buy cookies at lunch but when he looked at me and said, "Do you really need to eat those?" my stomach would turn queasy and I just wasn't hungry anymore. My mom would make me breakfast and bring it to me in my room because I was always running late. She never noticed all the bagels and English muffins in my trash. I lost 20 pounds that year. No one noticed.

One night, I heard words leave my "loving" boyfriend's lips that I will never forget. "Everyone else is having sex, are you ready yet?" Sex was certainly not the first thing on my mind. I was terribly frightened by the whole thing but he loved me and he wanted to and he had been so patient waiting for me to "be ready." I heard, "If I really loved him I would." A big warning light should have started blinking in my head.

I was a puppet and he was pulling the strings. I would do anything for him and he knew that. I worked four days a week so that I could buy him the sneakers he wanted and we could go see the new action movie that was playing. I hate action movies.

One day while we were standing by my locker, one of his friends asked me, "So, who are your friends anyway?" I was dumbfounded. I didn't know how to explain that I didn't have time for girlfriends. I spent all of my time with Bill because he wouldn't have it any other way.

It was our one-year anniversary and he was gone for the weekend. When he returned he was acting rather strange. We went for to talk and all he kept saying was, "I can't tell you what's wrong because I don't want to hurt you." In my mind I knew he was going to break up with me. My frail body shook violently as I cried hysterically. When he finally told me he had only kissed another girl, I was relieved and hugged him as tightly as I could.

The story continues and becomes worse, but eventually I knew I couldn't live like this anymore. I wasn't able to sleep at night and I hadn't eaten a full meal for months. We broke up that summer, and it's been a long five years since. For a long time I wouldn't allow myself to eat pizza, or chips and salsa, they were too fattening. When I saw other people eating food I didn't touch, I couldn't understand how they could do that to their bodies. Didn't they care about themselves? I thought I did.

My eating behaviors didn't change right away. You can't turn an eating disorder on and off. I had lost control of everything; eating was something I could regulate. Whenever I was hungry, I would do a hundred sit-ups instead of eating. If I ate something I wasn't supposed to — like a cookie, I would have to exercise right away or else I would lose everything I had accomplished.

The journey to recovery has been long and painful. It was a long while before I was able to find happiness within myself. People would always ask me, "Why don't you ever smile?" How do you tell someone you have no emotions left in your soul? That you're scared and have no idea where you have been, where you are, or where you are going. I was lost in a sea of sadness. People finally began to notice.

An abusive relationship does not begin right away; it's a gradual process of manipulation. My only wish is for this to never happen again. If you find yourself in a situation that you cannot control, reach out for help. I lost my life that year; I will never lose it again.

Pakastani woman murdered by dad said divorce would dishonor family

By Kathy Gannon
Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Prompted by the murder of a young woman seeking a divorce, former prime minister Benazir Bhutto warned yesterday of a conspiracy against women in Pakistan.

Bhutto's passionate letter to international human rights groups followed the slaying last week of 32-year-old Samia Imran, who was shot and killed by a gunman hired by her parents. Imran's father said a divorce would dishonor the family.

Although both parents have said they masterminded the killing, no arrests have been made.

"There is an all-encompassing conspiracy against women... in the name of Islam," Bhutto warned in her letter to the United Nations and other organizations.

"Our society today is in the hands of fundamentalists who are openly opposed to women having any rights and any chance of justice," she said.

A prominent Pakistani human rights lawyer, Asma Jehangir, who was representing Imran, said she has been receiving death threats since the shooting.

"Threats to kill me are being made publicly, and people are being exhorted to commit violence against me," said Jehangir in a statement released from Geneva, where she is attending a human rights conference.

Implants still dangerous, says court

By Jessica Saunders
Associated Press

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — A court-appointed committee report that found breast implants do not cause illness should be thrown out because a panel member had an undisclosed financial tie with an implant maker, attorneys for women with implants said Tuesday.

Dr. Peter Tugwell of the University of Ottawa, one of four members on the scientific panel that issued the December report, received money from implant-maker Bristol-Myers Squibb for matters not related to the implant litigation, according to a motion filed in federal court.

The motion asked U.S. District Judge Sam C. Pointer Jr. to invalidate the report and disband the entire panel, whose report affected thousands of breast implant cases.

The panel's findings, drawn for use in courts nationwide, were a major blow to women seeking damages for illnesses they claimed were caused by defective silicon implants.

Attorney Robert Gordon said that Tugwell, the University of Ottawa's director of medicine, never disclosed his receipt of a $750 honorarium from Bristol-Myers for participating in a company seminar in 1998.

He also failed to reveal that he signed a letter asking the company for up to $10,000 in 1997 to fund a professional meeting he co-chaired, Gordon said.

"This was a terrible breakdown of trust," said Sybil Niden Goldrich, a former implant recipient who founded an organization to provide information to women with implants.

The panel's attorney, John Kobayashi, issued a statement saying panel members will not comment because of the pending litigation. Bristol-Myers' director of public policy, Jane Kramer, said the contacts between Tugwell and the company were not significant enough to have influenced the panel's findings.

MISSION: CONTROL!
Burning Airlines
DeSoto

This album has to go down as one of the great disappointments of the year. Formed out of the ashes of the late, great Jawbox, Burning Airlines contains none of the brilliant inertia of the former band, and only hints at the talent of the members. And it's impossible to mention this band without bringing up Jawbox.

Still grounded in their Washington D.C. punk roots, the three-piece, which includes ex-Jawbusters Bill Barbot and J. Robbins (on bass and guitar/lead vocals, respectively) and drummer Peter Moffet, lives in the shadow of the old band. While still experimental lyrically and musically, it's just not as interesting. One of the problems might be the fact that while in Jawbox, Robbins and Barbot both played guitar, trading off barbed, twisting riffs that added depth to the dense, complicated songs.

Mission: Control! on the other hand, is musically spare. Moffet cannot hold a candle to Zach Barocas' jazz-inflected drumming in Jawbox, and Barbot seems lost on bass, a role once played with simple, concrete steadiness by his wife Kim Colletta.

But Robbins still knows how to write lyrics. "I never dreamed/ I'd learn to love/ the taste of bitter fictions/ the ring of contradictions/ that sing to me" he sings on "Pacific 231." Or the great line that threatens to collapse in on itself in "The Escape Engine": "The code that we spoke in is broken beyond repair/ and I don't care." And it's not to say that the album is unlistenable, it's just not... not... great.

In the end, there is no joy on this album. It feels pieced together, inorganic. And in the shadow of Jawbox (there's that name again), it only pales horribly. C

KEEP IT LIKE A SECRET Built to Spill
Warner Bros.

Trax On Trax Off

Hailed as indie-rock saviors making the jump to the majors, Built to Spill will not save indie-rock. In fact, no one will save it. It will either decide, as an entity, to keep swimming in its own preteensions and cliches (hello, Buddy Holly glasses!) or will realize what makes it so special in the first place: to make music that is not for everyone, but effects a few in immeasurable ways.

Whew. Now that I'm done my whole what's-wrong-with- indie rant, on to Keep It Like A Secret, an album that sounds like living in your mom's house — just a little bit comfortable, but still a bit depressing in it's ugly familiarity.

Built to Spill is indie stalwart Doug Martsch's band, and he has brought his indie sense along with him to Warners, which is admirable. The problem is, it's also rather worn out. The production on this album is just a bit off, from the way the cymbals seem to overtake the mix to the way the guitars have this too-lazy-to-be-clear/too-lazy-to-be-d istorted sound. Martsch's voice is a problem, too: in tune but whiny. The band lacks focus, and sometimes, it seems, even energy.

There are moments of inspiration from the amazing lift of the best song on the album, "Carry the Zero" ("You have become, yeah you have become, the fraction of the sum.") to the crying slide guitars that dot some songs. But not enough.

For an album that brought with it so much hype, this one rarely realizes its potential. C (M.M.)

Every so often a really poor band is "discovered" by a record label executive. The label signs the group and all of a sudden, we common listeners end up having to listen to new, insipid and audibly horrific music available everywhere — be it on MTV, radio, or on television programs such as the WBTV

Fear Factory delights Palladium

Metalheads Fear Factory kicked some headbanger ass at the Palladium last weekend.

FEAR FACTORY/HED(P.E.)/SPINESHANK
The Palladium
April 10

WORCESTER — The best part about upcoming metal bands and/or seeing concerts at the Palladium is that, if you really want to, you can meet the band members. Even before waiting in line my friend and I were at the food court of a nearby mall enjoying some unfortunately named, but still tasty, "preizel nuggets" when we met Johnny Santos, lead singer of Spineshank. Some meaningless conversation took place, but he was a nice guy. After the show, Static-X singer Wayne Static was outside signing autographs and was genuinely nice to everyone. On my way out of the show I caught up with Hed(p.e.) vocalist M.C.U.D. who-I congratulated for a great show, to which he responded, "Respect," and went on his way. In fact, the only band I didn't meet was Fear Factory, but their blazing set definitely left an impression on everyone in attendance that night, including myself.

Predictable opener "Shock" whipped the crowd into an early frenzy, and the follow-up performance of "New Breed" was the only variation on the set list the band put forth on its last visit to Massachusetts. The crowd was enthusiastic throughout, and responded to material from the new album Obsolete, as well as previous efforts Demanufacture and Soul of a new Machine. The new material sounded especially crisp; most notable being the head-banding goodness of "Edgecrusher" and the slow-to-heavy progression of "Resurrection." At one point, near the end of the show, guitarist Dino Cazares asked for requests, which led to an awesome medley that the audience definitely enjoyed. Sampling bits of Slayer's "Angel of Death" and White Zombie's "Thunderkiss '65" was just a prelude to the full sing-a-long for Pantera's "Walk" and Sepultura's "Roots Bloody Roots." After this unexpected occurrence, the band launched into its final two songs the crushing sound of "Replica" and "Scapegoat."

Previous to Fear Factory was a set by one of, if not the best, rap-metal group around, Hed(p.e.). Their sound ranges from a full-on heavy, aggressive metal, to a more mellow rap/lyrik style. Unfortunately, everyone in the band seemed to have lent themselves to a little too much pre-show partying, so the hour long show consisted only of about six songs. In between was M.C.U.D angrily accusing the crowd of "player hating" him, which was funny until one realized he was to gone he might have been dead serious. The rest of the band was equally "influenced" by something or other, and looked starry eyed while stretching some songs to over ten minutes. Some of the songs played include "Darky" and "Serpent Boy." Next time, barring some outside influences, this band could be incredible.

Much less special was the performance by Spineshank. This was only the second time I have seen them, and already their songs seem stale and boring. On CD they sound precise and interesting, but performed live, the music takes a back seat to the lackluster vocal styling of singer Johnny Santos. I still recommend Spineshank's CD Strictly Diesel, but their live performances needs some work.

Californians (like everyone else on the bill), Static-X opened the show with an odd but ultimately enjoyable set. Mosh-worthy or not, the set was undeniably good, with singer Wayne Static's memorable vocals (and haircut) on full display, as well as the talents of drummer Ken Jay and guitarist Koichi Fukuda.

Triple Optic Television

Amidst the highly-stimulated, over-saturated world of media, comes a unique television program providing a legitimate source for visual and vocal hip-hop. 3rd Eye Unlimited, a video production crew primarily rooted in Massachusetts, brings to the set a refreshing show called "Put Out the Word," where the true organisms of hip-hop are skillfully arranged and transferred to the screen. 3rd Eye anchorman and UMass student, Ben Gilbarg a.k.a. First Born, stresses that "Put Out the Word" focuses on "edutaining the hip-hop community," as well as "displaying a variety of talents unseen by the masses." During its hour- long, bi-weekly broadcasts, a plethora of elemental culture is unveiled; from DJ spotlights to live performances interlaced with interviews and original graphic effects. By no means is this a music video show or a dialogue-ridden Q&A segment. 3rd Eye Unlimited has constructed an innovative vehicle in which they hope will eventually web into a media network. As a long-established appreciator of the culture, Gilbarg understands that "it is often a two-headed coin for established and 'underground' artists," and that the show seeks to exemplify both equally.

David Katzoff

Representing the growth of the hip-hop community, Unlimited is unbound by the conventional notion of rap-influenced television. On the local level, 3rd Eye has documented various events such as the Grownsoul's fashion inauguration and on-campus concerts. Currently the crew is collaborating with numerous sources from Canada to Texas, aspiring to expand their view-base and edutain the globe. Previous segments of "Put Out the Word" have featured artists such as RZA, Jeru, Black Star (and a highly intoxicated Eminem), Kid Capri, M.O.P., Originoo Gunn Clappaz and Heltah Skeltah; DJ's Lefty, Next, 7L and Chubby Chubb; plus underground sensations like Thirstin Howl III, Esoteric, Enemy Squad, Octagon Supreme, Alias, Akrobatik & Lif, Manhunt and many others.

This week, on-campus residents can catch an all-new episode of "Word," with Das Efx and True World Order. The show airs regularly on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 8:00 p.m. on UVC channel 19 for the dorm-dwellers and Fridays at 6:00 p.m. on channel 10 for the off-campus, rent-paying folk. Those interested in enhancing their background in the hip-hop medium can call Ben at 549-6762 or stop by the UVC station located in the Student Union belly.

So, open all three of your retinas and be sure to tune in to help our own community "Put Out the Word."

hit, "Dawson's Creek."

Oleander's new album, February Son, for some reason or another, was actually released on a "reputable" label, Republic (current home of Chumbawamba and Vanilla Ice), which makes me doubt whether the mainstream record industry has anything left to offer. Put simply, Oleander is a mix of two equally dull and unoriginal bands: Stone Temple Pilots and Bush.

What would compel a band to want to sound like these groups? It's best to credit the weakness of this album to something I can't understand, like a bizarre psychological disorder that's so complex, the patient has to be hospitalized. To use one of their song titles, Oleander is a "Lost Cause". F

MAYBE YOU'VE BEEN BRAINWASHED TOO
New Radicals
Does it matter?

Okay, this sucks! Pure and simple. The absolute last thing we need is more mall music (check out current video — it's not like you can escape it). "You Get What You Give" is such a formulaic, mindlessly catchy tune you can actually picture the band copying right out of the "How to Write Bad Songs" book. I feel sympathy for the pre-teen crowd that this crap is aimed at.

If all was right and good in the world, this band would not be invading my privacy. Keep your distance, New Radicals may bring about the end of civilization as we know it—or reinforce civilization as we know it, but I don't know which is worse. F - (Kevin Monahan)

CHYNA DOLL
Foxy Brown
Violator/Def Jam

Someone call the police! Lil' Kim's style has just been stolen by the Ill Na Na herself, Foxy Brown. Most of what has ever made Foxy stand out is missing on Chyna Doll. Aside from her unapologetic "borrowing" of Lil' Kim's flow, this follow-up to the double platinum Ill Na Na is missing the input of sampling-extraordinaires Trackmasters. So, though the beats are somewhat entertaining, there are none of the guilty pleasures of her debut. Foxy Brown has never rapped about anything more than material things and that is still the same. "My Life," however, is the most insightful Foxy joint to date. Unfortunately, it appears in the beginning and the rest of the album cannot compete. The Swiss "I only have one" Beat-produced "Dog & a Fox" featuring 2Pac wannabe, DMX, is another embarrassing example of Foxy's style theft. The barely danceable dance track "Hot Spot," the first single, and the blatantly commercial "I.O.B.," featuring songbird Mya, provide the ear candy Foxy Brown fans expect, but is missing from the rest of the album. Overall, the beats are moderately thumping, but wasted on Foxy and her "new" flow. On an up note, Jay-Z is not wasted this time around, like on Ill Na Na's "I'll Be." Jigga's skills on "Bonnie & Clyde Part 2" are a sound for sore ears. There are numerous cameos, increasingly a hip-hop prerequisite, but they cannot distract one from the sound of a rap diva about to fall off. D+ (Lenny Holston) tently and has more responsibility with the injuries, and I think she is handling it really well."

Young has also had to learn to deal with the length of a college season. Despite the fact that you don't get a chance to play many games, they do practice year around and work very hard throughout.

"It's definitely long. I don't find myself getting tired during the lacrosse season, [but] during the preseason I find myself getting tired especially in the fall when it's just us running. It kind of makes me think back and to March and April, when we're playing games. I think mentally I get tired but physically I never get tired. I guess I'm just too used to it to get tired," Young said.

The goals for the season for Lynne Young are team oriented and she is looking to possibly get back to the playoffs. However, losses to Syracuse, Boston University and a one-goal loss to Brown might hurt UMass' chances.

"I think if we win Atlantic 10s, there is still a hope but unfortunately we had those games at the beginning of the year that just shouldn't of happened. We went to ECAC's last year not knowing that we had a chance so I'm not going to put anything past us," Young said.

But Young felt that in order for the team to make these goals become a reality, they would need to play in the fashion in which they have been successful and that is by playing a team-oriented game.

"We need to finish out the season playing team ball. I don't think we can say it enough — how awesome we play when we are playing team ball. We went down to North Carolina and we competed, and I think no matter who's out on the field or who's injured I just definitely think we can compete with the best of them," Young said.

When the freshman came to campus, Assistant Coach Elizabeth Zinney saw "things that needed to be changed. She needed an adjustment in training."

"I came out of high school never having done a workout, not knowing what real training was. My first workout here I was like, 'I need to run that much'," Rubino said. "I took for granted not having to work in high school. Now I'm in the best shape I've ever been in."

Coming in having never done much of a workout was noticeable to Zimney. She was frustrated, but "[Rubino] kept at it. Her improvement is noticeable."

Rubino's improvement has a great deal to do with who she trains with. She trains with seniors Shelanda Irish and Melanie Bell; athletes with experience and an excellent work ethic. Rubino said that Irish is "the best athlete I've ever seen."

"I think they are good role models for her," Zimney said. "I've seen a big improvement in her body and her mental capacity."

With her training regiment squared away, Rubino has become one of the top athletes in the program.

Now, Rubino has burst onto the UMass track scene. She finds herself competing in the 4x100 relay for the outdoor track squad with three seniors. She competes with Irish, Rose Bryan and Raqueil Shelton. Rubino was put into this event after emerging as one of the top sprinters in the program after the indoor season. In high school, she ran the anchor of the 4x100, which gave her a "mental toughness," Zimney said.

In the indoor season, Rubino qualified for the New England Championships in the 55 meter dash. "My first time running the 55 was at Brown University, and I didn't make the finals. That was a shock. I didn't think I was going to be able to keep up with everyone," she said. "After I qualified, I got to relax. It was like, 'Here, you did it'."

With the outdoor season only two weeks old, Rubino has already qualified for the New Englands in the 100 meters and the long jump. She has also shown signs of brilliance in the triple jump.

"She has been a great addition to our program. She has a lot of talent and is a great competitor. I get excited when athletes compete with a lot of heart," LaFremiere said. "Once she gets used to everything, she'll take off."

The Southwick native can't stress enough how great her teammates are. "I love the team, everyone's great. I have a lot of close friends on the team. We help each other out," Rubino said. "I don't miss any experiences because most of my friends are on the team."

Rubino's wish for the program is for UMass to get a track facility. "It would be nice to have a home meet and have everyone come down to watch. The team would love the support," she said.

What Rubino likes best about UMass other than track is her independence. "It makes me feel good about myself."

The freshman sensation can only improve. Her goals are high and if she continues at this pace she will flourish in her career in Amherst.

es as to who is hot in terms of putting the puck in the net. The San Jose Sharks have two of the hottest players in the respective conference, Ian Vineent Damphousse and Joe Murphy, who have combined for 16 points in the last five San Jose games.

For the 'Lanche interestingly enough, their hottest player over the last six games has been defenseman Sandis Ozolinsh, who was crucial in the Ava's '95 Stanley Cup run. He has netted four goals while contributing three helpers for seven points.

Between the pipes in the West, it's a combination of guys you would expect and guys you wouldn't. In Detroit, both of their net-minders are hot, which could cause problems come playoff time. Chris Osgood and Bill Ranford, two guys with a little bit of playoff experience, have combined to lead the Red Wings to a 5-1-1 record over their last seven and have gathered a micro-cosy GAA of 1.49 between them and a save percentage of 93.2.

The other netminder who's feeling it, and has three Stanley Cup rings to prove he's great at this time of the year, is Patrick Roy, who has a GAA of 1.50 and a 95.1 save percentage while leading his team to a 4-0 mark.

The surprise of the bunch has to be San Jose netminder Steve Shields, who is 4-0, in the last four games and has a GAA of .75 and a save percentage of 97.3, which is absurd. The Sharks are hot at the right time and could be a problem for the Avalanche. With the hottest goalie in the league and two really hot shooters they could be a force to reckon with.

• Injuries will play into the equation as well.

In the Eastern Conference, The teams with injury problems are the teams that were expected to do well and overcome things like this. Philadelphia is currently without Eric Lindros (40-55-95), who is one of the biggest parts of their offense, although the Flyers are starting to get some players back like John LeClair and Mark Recchi.

The Penguins are without Darius Kasparaitis on D, who is out indefinitely with a knee sprain and are watching the play of Martin Straka and Jaromir Jagr, who are just both coming off of injuries. One has to see how much that will figure into the playoffs.

Ottawa just returned two stars that they need to be healthy for the duration of the playoffs, namely Igor Kravchuk, and Shawn McEachern. Both will be key in their run.

The Maple Leafs are without Igor Korolev until may with a fractured finger. That will hurt the Leafs' chances.

In the Western Conference, the injuries look to be more serious. St. Louis is without Geoff Courtnall and Jim Campbell, while Anaheim is without Paul Kariya and Teemu Salenne's linemate Steve Rucchin.

Detroit currently is missing Chris Chelios and Darren McCarty, who are day-to-day, and are without Uwe Krupp, who is out indefinitely with a back problem.

Edmonton lost any hope of doing well in the playoffs when they lost one of their top scorers in young Josef Bernuck who had knee surgery yesterday.

The Stars just lost one of their maintstays and emotional leaders, Pat Verbeck, until late April due to a strained knee suffered Monday. Colorado is currently day-to-day with Adam Deadmarsh, and are without the services of Valeri Kamensky, who is out until mid-May with a broken arm suffered on March 14.

When you factor in all these equations, the picture starts to get clearer on who exactly will win the Cup, or does it get foggier. That's why it's "the coolest game on earth" and fans watch this month and a half of hockey so intently, because anything can happen.

more picks and select Daunte Culpepper (Central Florida) to fill their QB worries.

• The third pick in the draft belongs to the Cincinnatti Bengals, who are also in desperate need of a QB, but will also be concerned with solidifying their offensive line, which was atrocious last season.

They will likely select whoever is left after the first two teams select their field generals, but then will look defensive, by picking a corner with the No. 33 selection. Look for the Bengals to select Bryant (Alabama) or Antione Winfield (Ohio State), whichever is left. Then look for the Cats to pick tackle Jon Jansen (Michigan) or Kris Farris (UCLA) in the third round.

The Bengals will be looking for help at the guard position in the middle rounds, looking for players like Anthony Cesario (Colorado), and possibly Kelvin Garmon (Baylor) or Mike Rosenthal (Notre Dame) to help sure up the offensive line for the new, young QB.

• The Indianapolis Colts would look like the front runner for Ricky Williams if they do not sign the Marshall Faulk, but will likely select Bailey if they want to work on their cornerback situation. They also need help at the linebacker spot and will select Chris Claiborne (USC) to dominate the middle for the Colts for years to come.

The problem for the Colts is that they only have five picks, so don't be surprised if they are listening to deals for the fourth pick in order to get a few more.

• The Washington Redskins look to be the team for Champ Bailey — if they can get through the Colts' pick, they will undoubtedly select the two-way threat. The Skins look to do the brunt of their damage in the middle rounds, though, when they need to fill holes on the O-line, D-line, linebacker and kicker positions. The Skins need to start with the impact player, and that looks to be Bailey.

• The St. Louis Rams have so many problems, and, unfortunately for them, the draft isn't 11 or even 15 rounds anymore.

The Rams have eight picks to make up for the likely loss of QB Tony Banks, RB Jerald Moore and WR Eddie Kennison. Not only does the team need a running back, a wide receiver and a corner, but they need depth at almost every other position, so look for the Rams to select Williams if he is there, or Bailey if he is still available.

If all of those options are dry, the Rams might be looking at Edgerrin James (Miami) or wide receivers Torry Holt (North Carolina State) or David Boston (Ohio State).

• The two teams in most trouble are the Carolina Panthers and the San Diego Chargers, who both have plenty of holes to fill but no draft picks in the first round.

As far as the players they might select to make an impact when they finally get picks, look for Carolina to select a player like Jon Jansen (Michigan) at tackle if he is around, or to select Kris Farris (UCLA) or Floyd Wedderburn (Penn State) at the guard position.

For the Chargers, defensive ends are the priority, but there isn't great depth at that position in this year's draft. They will probably be looking to take one of the less talented corners, like Ty Talton (Northern Iowa) or Chris Watson (Eastern Illinois). The Chargers also might still just try to fill the hole at D-end and pick up Patrick Kerney (Virginia) or Lamar King (Saginaw Valley). It is likely that neither of these players will be around as everyone is in search of a solid defensive end, so the Chargers might have to settle for a corner or D-end Dimitrius Underwood (Michigan State), which wouldn't be so bad.

The Chargers and the Panthers just need a lot more picks than they have to be successful.

• The Chicago Bears took care of one of their needs in last year's draft, and that was at running back with the selection of Curtis Enis, now they will have to sure up their QB, WR or LB situation with the No. 7 pick.

The Bears want to select a QB first, but if Smith and McNabb are both gone, you might see a deal down for two first round picks so that the Bears can select Cade McNown (UCLA) with their first pick and forego the best pass rusher in the draft, in Florida's Jevon Kearse. But Chicago could select a quality D-end anyway, which would set up the Bears to select David Boston in the second round, filling yet another need for the team at wideout.

• Selecting eighth and 21st are my boys from Arizona, whom I predicted to make the playoffs for the first time in a non-strike year since 1982.

The Cardinals will only improve with their 11 picks this year. Look for them to give Jake "the snake" Plummer a wideout to throw to in the form of Torry Holt from NC State, because they can't break the cardinal rule of selecting an offensive linemen too high in the draft. The Cardinals will fill that hole in the first round, probably by selecting John Tait (BYU) or possibly even L.J. Shelton (Eastern Michigan), who is the second highest rated D-end in the draft.

The Cardinals are poised for another run at the playoffs — and don't lie, it felt good to watch them knock off the Cowboys.

• The ninth pick in the draft belongs to the Detroit Lions and their strongest needs are on the offensive line. They might also be thinking secondary in a division that includes Randy Moss, Chris Carter, Antonito Freeman and Robert Brooks. The Lions will be expected to select either of these positions, but surprisingly enough the Detroit brain trust feels that they need to address the linebacker situation before anything else.

The Lions are talking about Claiborne and Kearse for left outside linebacker, but the concern should definitely be concentrated somewhere else.

Expect the Lions to select possibly Matt Stinchcomb (Georgia) at tackle before it's all over, as well as guards as good as Brandon Burlsworth (Arkansas) or Randy Thomas (Mississippi State). Also look for the team from the Motor City to take some of the high quality corners, like possibly Talton, Watson or even Paul Miranda (Central Florida).

The depth at safety in the draft might also be enticing for the Detroit, so they could come out with steals like Tony George (Florida) or Mike McKenzie (Memphis) due to the lack of huge need for quality safeties in the NFL as a whole.

• Looking for a team that should be better than they are? Look no further then the Baltimore Ravens, who have selected quality player after quality player in the past couple of drafts. Look for this team to try and make some noise with their six picks.

In the past, this team has solidified it's defense, and it's slowly getting there, but this year needs to be about offense and taking care of their secondary.

The Ravens want Smith or McNabb at the QB position with the 10th pick, but if they need to give up too much to get one of them, expect them to wait for Culpepper.

The Ravens are possibly looking at trading up for Williams at running back, which is another of the team's dire needs, but they don't need to give up too much. They have too many holes to fill and should take what they can get and maybe bite the bullet with Scott Mitchell for a year.

The Ravens are also looking at wideouts Johnson and Boston, but so are a lot of teams. They might end up with Troy Edwards (Louisiana Tech), which could be the steal of the draft, as he led NCAA wide receivers in nearly every category last season.

• The New Orleans Saints are a team that looked like they had a lot of potential at the beginning of last season, but that was just a farce. They are still in need of a solid QB and two solid wideouts — oh, and yeah, a quality running back. Mind you, the Saints have a lot of work to do, but could be benefitted by trading the 12th pick for a couple of more draft selections.

Right now, Coach Mike Ditka's strategy is to trade everything for Ricky Williams. This is a classic example of why you don't give a long-time head coach control of football operations. This type of move would leave the Saints with bigger problems now than when they paid absurd amounts of money on Heath Shuler and Kerry Collins. Just another ridiculous statement in the long atrocious history of the 'Aints.

• The 13th and 14th picks in the first round belong to two teams in the AFC that aren't used to being in this position for a long time. The Kansas City Chiefs and the Pittsburgh Steelers probably can't remember when the last time was that they didn't make the playoffs, but now they both have reasonable picks in the first round and throughout the draft.

The Steelers are in much better shape than the Chiefs, owning 11 picks in the 1999 draft, while KC only has five. But the needs for the Chiefs seem far less.

The Chiefs are still looking for a back to replace Marcus Allen. They will also be looking for a solid corner along with a left tackle. The minor needs include two wide receivers for depth. Expect the Chiefs to fill all these needs. They might select Wisconsin right guard Aaron Gibson who could end up starting at left tackle, or maybe the Chiefs might move Victor Riley back to his natural left tackle and keep Gibson on the right.

The Chiefs are also looking at North Carolina's Dre' Bly to take over for veteran Dale Carter, who left via free agency over the off-season.

The Steelers have more holes to fill, but also have six more draft picks than do the Chiefs. The Steelers' concerns are at receiver where they need two quality ones after losing both Yancy Thigpen and Charles Johnson. Both left in consecutive years for the green waters of free agency. They will also be looking for a solid free safety.

With the 13th pick look for the Steelers to take Boston from Ohio State, whose size will give Kordell Stewart a nice target down field. Even if Boston is gone, the Steelers will likely have a shot at the draft's dark horse, Edwards, D'Wayne Bates (Northwestern), who is a big quality receiver, and Peerless Price (Tennessee), who will be a threat returning the ball for Pittsburgh.

The Steelers can wait for the third round to select a good free safety. They could easily steal McKenzie or Larry Atkins (UCLA) that late.

Look in tomorrow's Collegian to catch the second half of the NFL Draft preview.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may be attracted to someone today who demands more from you "on the job" than you're used to, and you can bet the attraction is mutual.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You're expecting people to be loyal and hard-working at this time, and you can indeed inspire them to do more than usual. The quality may improve as well.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may be playing the "waiting game" throughout much of the day, but in the meantime, you should address certain pressing personal issues.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You're open to much of what comes your way today, but you may not know how to interpret some things at first. Trust those who have been in your shoes.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be surprised to learn just what is coming your way, but you'll want to double- check to make sure that your sources are indeed reliable.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may feel as though someone is putting you on the spot, but the fact is that you are capable of coming through "in a pinch." Don't tell yourself short!

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — It's a good time to form stronger bonds with those at the workplace, especially since the workload is about to increase significantly.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Today is a good day to listen to those voices that are ringing in your head. Take care, however, to share the information with only a chosen few.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Things that become disorderly early in the day are likely to straighten themselves out, so don't be tempted to meddle. Keep your nose out of the way!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Take time out from your busy schedule to reflect on your career. You may want to make changes, but you just don't know where to start.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Can you keep up the pace? It's essential that things progress at a healthy rate, but you must take care you don't drive yourself to exhaustion.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — It's a good day to do things in order and by the book. Any improvisation on your part is likely to attract some critical attention.

Quote of the Day

"I don't know where I'm gonna live. Don't know if I'll find a place. I'll have to think about it some. And that I do not wish to face."

NHL's playoffs troubled with conference woes

There are numerous things that need to be taken into account when the National Hockey League playoffs begin.

• One is positioning who a team is going to face: a hot team or a cold team. Or whether it will be a relatively good team, or a team that is struggling.

• Another is injuries — who will be missing during the month and a half while the run for the most desired trophy in sports is fought over.

• Yet another is who's got the hot goalie and hot players. A hot goalie can lead a team all the way to the Cup. Remember what a hot goalie did for the Czech Republic in the Olympics? Enough said. The same can be said of a hot forward who is streaking at just the right time.

For all the teams who are going to be in the 16 team tournament, all of these factors become the most important variables over the next several days and weeks as the NHL sets up its run.

The positioning in the Eastern Conference breaks down like this: No. 1 in the conference still hasn't been settled. As the Ottawa Senators currently have 101 points, but are being chased furiously by the Devils, who have 99.

The Carolina Hurricanes have clinched the third spot, due to winning the worst division in hockey, but they will quickly be ousted from the playoffs.

The Toronto Maple Leafs have all but sewn up the four seed, holding a five point lead over Philadelphia, while only three points separate the No. 5 seeded Flyers and the No. 8 seeded Boston Bruins.

Well, here is the relevance of all this. Whoever finishes sixth comes out on top because they get almost a bye playing the Hurricanes. Whoever draws the Flyers has a solid chance themselves, as the Flyers have been playing bad hockey at best. This is why positioning is so crucial, and games like the Flyers/Sabres, Flyers/Bruins and the Penguins/Bruins contests of this week are so crucial.

In the West, things are a little more tame in terms of positioning. The Dallas Stars have clinched the No. 1 seed in the West and the President's Trophy, which goes to the team in the league with the most regular season points.

No. 2 Colorado holds a four point lead over arch rival Detroit, but it would take a small miracle for Detroit to overtake the Avalanche. The No. 4 seed Phoenix has sewn up that spot, so there are your four home sights in the Western half of the playoffs.

Toward the bottom half of the conference is where things get a little tighter. Only in terms of the No. 5 and No. 6 seeds, where Anaheim has 82 points but is trailed by only one point by the St. Louis Blues. The difference is huge for everyone involved. For St. Louis and Anaheim, the question is whether to face the division champion and two-time defending Stanley Cup Champion Detroit, or to face a slumping Phoenix team.

The San Jose Sharks round out the conference in seventh and the Oilers of Edmonton eighth, which is where they will likely stay.

• The next factor of consideration in terms of the playoffs is who's got the hot scorers and who's got the hot goalie.

In the Eastern Conference, the hottest teams include Toronto, who has two of the hottest players in the conference, namely Yanic Perreault and Sergei Berezin, who have combined for 22 points in the last seven games.

One that might come as a surprise is the Bruin's Anson Carter, who has tallied six goals and two assists in the last six games for the B's.

Who's hot in net in the East is almost the most important thing, though. There are a number of goalies who are seeing the puck pretty well. Philadelphia's John Vanbiesbrouck has a 1.51 GAA in the last four games and a 3–1 record, while Dominik Hasek has a .97 GAA, a 95.9 save percentage and a 2–0–1 record in his last three. Martin Brodeur of New Jersey also has a sub 2.00 GAA (1.61), with a 4–1 record in his last five games. Curtis Joseph has compiled a 94.1 save percentage, while carrying the Maple Leafs to a 3–1–1 record over his last five.

But no one has been more spectacular than the Byron "?" Dafoe, who has a 1.00 GAA, two shutouts and a 95.6 save percentage while leading the Bruins to 4–0 record over his last four games. These numbers bode well for the five teams that currently have a playoff ready netminder in the East.

In the West, there are more surpris-

Young leads lax via defense

COURTESY JORMA KANSANEN

Defender Lynne Young has been a stifling force for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, shutting down the lead scorer for the opposition in every opportunity she gets.

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

When one thinks of women's sports at the high school level, the first sports that come to mind are field hockey, soccer, volleyball, basketball and softball. Although Massachusetts women's lacrosse defender Lynne Young didn't start off as a lacrosse player, she has brought her game and UMass' defense to a higher level, en route to helping UMass to an ECAC birth last season, and also earning two Second Team Northeast All–America honors in her freshman and sophomore campaigns.

"I was a big soccer player when I was little. Soccer and basketball were my thing. I guess I just picked it (lacrosse) up by watching my older sister play. When I was in seventh grade my high school got lacrosse and my sister played it her senior year, and by ninth grade my basketball coach had recruited me to play," Young said of how she got started playing lacrosse.

At Saratoga Springs High School in Saratoga Springs, N.Y., Young won all sorts of accolades for her play. She was a U.S. Women's Lacrosse Association All–American selection as a senior. She also captained her team to two straight Sectional Championships and also earned first team All–Capital District honors and second team as a junior.

"I started off as kind of a midfielder back in high school, when I use to be fast, because when you come to college and Division I, everyone is fast," Young said.

In Young's junior year of high school she was selected to play for the 1995 Empire National Women's Lacrosse Team. Nationals, is a school girl tournament on a regional level, with teams representing some of the major lacrosse hotbeds such as Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey and New England teams. It includes the best players from the specific state.

"In high school — my junior year when I was selected to play nationals, that's when I was actually played low defender," said Young. "I don't think defense is something you play in high school. It's not really coached, as soon as I played Nationals, they teach you how to play defense and the skills needed to play defense. Once I started learning it, I really like it."

With all of Lynne Young's accomplishments during her high school career, it was a real boost for the UMass women's lacrosse program when they finally acquired Young.

"We had seen her play. She was looking at schools late in the recruiting process and she came to campus to visit with her dad," coach Francesca McClellan said. "We definitely wanted to have her, so we were very excited when she decided to come here."

The leading Minutewoman in ground balls over the last couple of seasons is also the UMass' top defender. Young has collected 114 groundballs over her first three years for the Minutewomen, while also scoring nine points, three of which are goals scored this season. Despite being a defender, Young contributes on the offensive side of the ball. But her biggest contribution for the Minutewomen is defending some of the country's best scorers on the best teams game in and game out.

"Sometimes I get a little more nervous than others. [Like] when we played Dartmouth and I had to guard Jacqie (Weitzel). It's more nerve-racking the more you think about it, I think of it as she's just another girl on the field. Otherwise, I get nervous," Young said. Young held Weitzel to only one goal in the game.

"I think that Lynne has really started to shine in the last stretch of games. She typically marks the opponent's top attacker," McClellan said. "Against Dartmouth she marked Jackie Weitzel and she only had one goal, that's pretty good — she's really gained momentum since that game."

With each passing year, Young continues to improve her game. She has become a more solid player as each season progresses.

"Her first year she was a starter with three seniors, where she learned good leadership qualities. In her sophomore year after they (the seniors) graduated, she was very responsible. She grew up very quickly and learned to be consistent," McClellan said. "This year she is playing extremely consis-

UM women's tennis down the Rhody racketeers, 7-1

By Jason Owens
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team flexed its muscles yesterday in a 7–1 home victory over Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island. The Minutewomen, who won in every match up except the No. 1 singles slot, finished up their league schedule in convincing fashion.

In cold and blustery conditions that favored the underdog Rams, the Minutewomen came out firing on all cylinders as they swept match after match in straight sets.

The lone exception to UMass' domination came in the No. 1 singles match, where Rhody's Marla Pasquale defeated the Minutewomen's Helana Horak in a tough three setter 6–4, 2– 6, 6–2. Horak, who usually plays in the No. 2 singles slot, played well, frustrating Pasquale with accurate serving and solid baseline play. But it was Pasquale, a strong player on a weaker Rhode Island team, who took the win. The win pushes Pasquale's record to 18–2 this season.

Ola Gerasimova, who has played out of the No. 1 singles slot for most of the season, won easily, 6–0, 6–1. Coach Judy Dixon has been trying to turn Gerasimova — usually a baseline volleyer — into a serve and volley specialist, and was pleased with the way her top player performed.

"She needs to gain more confidence if we're going to change her style," says Dixon. "She looked good today."

Co–captain Jackie Braunstein, Annie Hamilton, Robin Lebovitz, and Allie Tross all won their singles matches in straight sets, often pounding on a Rhody team that simply couldn't match UMass' aggressiveness or talent.

Co–captain Jillian Kane teamed with local talent Mishelle Kuhr to dominate Rhode Island 8–0 from the No. 3 doubles slot. Tross and Hamilton also scored a convincing win from the No. 2 doubles slot, easily defeating the Rams 8–2.

UM track molding Rubino

BETH KIRKORIAN / COLLEGIAN

Abby Rubino has blossomed into a productive member of the UMass women's track team after struggling through the transition from high school to college.

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

When it comes to hard work and dedication, Abby Rubino is the epitome. Rubino, a freshman biology major from Southwick, came to UMass wide–eyed and not knowing what to expect. What she did know was that she had a freedom that she had never had before.

In high school, she was a member of the National Honor Society. Academics is important to her, and she learned quickly that life in college was a lot different than life in high school. "I ran into a little problem first semester. Now I've found time management," Rubino said.

Coach Julie LaFreniere stresses academics as well. "They are a priority. If they don't perform in the classroom, they don't perform in track and field. If they have below a 2.5 GPA, they are required to go to study hall. The athletes are here to get an education," she said.

At Southwick–Tolland High School, Rubino holds the school record in the long jump, triple jump and 100 meter dash. She was named the team's Most Valuable Player all four years and captained the team her junior and senior seasons. For her accomplishments, she was named All–American her senior season.

"[The award] was good. It came as a surprise to me. To be at nationals and place in the top six was an honor," she said.

Her final decision on which college to attend was between Boston University and UMass.

"I came to UMass because of the coaches. They were honest with me when they were recruiting me. I can go to them with anything," Rubino said.

NFL draft time is here; Teves gives the skinny

It's that time of the year when all the football fanatics get ready to sit down in front of their television or go to Madison Square Garden in the heart of New York City for the two–day festival know as the National Football League Draft.

This two day event always brings excitement to the lives of the Fan–actics who are craving the NFL in April and all year round. This year's draft seems to be ready to provide the same type of intensity, trades and war–room deals.

• Let's start with the defending Super Bowl Champions, the Denver Broncos. Granted, their upcoming season's success will have a lot to do with whether or not John Elway comes back, but coach Mike Shanahan has 11 picks to work with in this year's draft, and he can take care of adding talent to his already stacked team and then worry about convincing Elway to come back.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Patriots owner Bob Kraft

The Broncos No. 1 priority is at defensive end. They are expected to release Neil Smith in June and will be looking to get a solid pass rusher. Many teams need pass rushers, including Tennessee, San Francisco and San Diego, just to mention a few, so you can expect them not to get a top– notch end unless they use some of their picks to trade up. If the Broncos remain pat, they are looking at possibly getting Tony Bryant (Florida State) or Dimitrius Underwood (Michigan State).

• The other Super Bowl team, the Atlanta Falcons have a lot of concerns to deal with — the biggest questions are at wide receiver, D–line and linebacker. The problem for the Falcons is that they don't pick until No. 30 in the first round, they don't have a second round pick and only have eight picks to work with. Although they would like to get defensive ends Ebenezer Ekuban (North Carolina) or Lamar King (Saginaw Valley), they will likely end up with Patrick Kerney (Virginia), who is an end who needs to work on game play and strength, but has the potential to be a star.

The Falcons will also need a receiver, so they will probably be looking at L.C. Stevens (N. Carolina) who is a bigger receiver to help out Chris Chandler, who throws a nasty deep ball, and would benefit from finally having a 6–foot–3 target who plays a physical style.

• The Minnesota Vikings stand as a team that can do a lot of damage again this year. They should have won the Super Bowl talent–wise last year, but that's why they play the games. The Vikings have nine picks and they own the 11th and 29th picks in the first round, and four of the first 75 in this year's draft and will be looking to improve their talented team. The biggest concerns for the Vikes are at fullback and cornerback, two concerns they will likely fill in the first round.

The Vikes lost Corey Fuller at left corner and will need to replace him. While many people expect the Vikings to package their two first round picks for Georgia's Champ Bailey, I wouldn't expect that. But I would expect them to draft the second best corner in the draft, Chris McAlister (Arizona) with the 11th selection.

Don't be surprised if the Vikes take Patrick Kerney out of the waiting hands of the Falcons, but I would expect the 29th pick to be fullback Rob Konrad (Syracuse), who is a house at that position. He is a great runner and an excellent receiver out of the backfield, and could create huge holes for Robert Smith this season.

Heisman Trophy winner Ricky Williams

• The New England Patriots are also looking to do some damage in the draft. They have two picks in the first round as they have the 20th and 28th pick in the draft, and are looking first and foremost to fill the hole left by the injured Robert Edwards, who tore his leg in half at a Pro Bowl charity game. It is not better to give then receive, obviously.

Don't be horrified if the Pats don't take a running back in the first round, as they might wait until the second and select Kevin Faulk (LSU), who would fit in perfectly. He can run, block and catch, and he can also return kicks. That is another area where the Patriots have moderate worries.

The Pats also have to fill two other holes. They should likely draft Damien Woody (Boston College) for the vacancy left by the departure of Dave Waltbaugh at center. They shouldn't even think cornerback until late, unless they can some how trade several of their 11 selections to get Bailey (Georgia), McAlister (Arizona), or Fernando Bryant (Alabama). After all, the Patriots have enough players who could be great corners already. They need to get a prototype corner.

• It's time to talk about the return of the Cleveland Browns to the NFL. The Browns have the first pick and 13 selections overall and are looking to get off on the right foot.

The Browns will likely select between quarterbacks Tim Couch (Kentucky) and Akili Smith (Oregon), as both are considered sure fire hits in the NFL. It isn't likely that the team will trade that pick, but expect a lot of pre–draft talk about that pick.

If the Browns do trade down they might look at Bailey as a possibility. He would fill a role as a solid wide receiver — which the Browns currently lack — while he would also add depth to the corner list and solidify the kick returner position for the Dawgs.

• The Philadelphia Eagles will be looking to improve their team considerably in this draft. Now that Ray Rhodes is gone, they can look to start rebuilding the program.

The Eagles will likely be looking to fill their hole at quarterback in this draft, so expect them to select Smith or possibly Donavan McNabb (Syracuse) with the second pick. It definitely looks like Heisman Trophy winning tailback Ricky Williams (Texas) is not in the team's future, because of the success of Duce Staley, who rushed for over 1,000 yards last season.

The Eagles are also a team that might consider trading down for Race scholarships create confusion

by Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Since the University of Massachusetts deprioritized the use of race in its admissions procedures, both undergraduate scholarships and graduate fellowships have undergone revisions.

There have been discrepancies, however, in University administrators' accounts of how the programs have been changed.

Chancellor Scott

University Chancellor David K. Scott was asked at a Feb. 25 meeting of the Graduate Student Senate whether or not the University would continue to offer race–exclusive scholarships. He responded by saying, "They do not do it exclusively on the issue of race. They have not been offered exclusively to students of color."

He later explained his position further. "The University does not offer race–exclusive scholarships or fellowships," he said, "although that's not to say we haven't offered them in the past." He also stated that he had been referring only to graduate programs.

In past weeks, the University has taken several steps to make its scholarships and fellowships open to students of all races. Vice–Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos has announced that Talented Minority (TAMIN) Scholarships have been eliminated, as have Academic Honors (ACHORN) Scholarships, in order

Students pack in for Kosovo

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Over a hundred students packed into the Campus Center yesterday to the attend a seminar on the war in Kosovo.

Teach In: Crisis in Kosovo was conducted by six professors from the University's Political Science department. Each professor gave a lecture on a different aspect of the war, and answered questions posed by students.

"I think the sheer number of students here attests to what's wrong with what the news media has done with this issue," said Professor James Der Derian, the first speaker. Der Derian stated that he hoped to clarify any misconceptions given by the media, which, he said, is given only "a compressed amount of time" to educate American citizens.

Der Derian spoke about the military strategies used in the crisis. He stressed that he knew of no perfect solution to the struggle, and was critical of the possibility of a ground war. "Ground forces make very bad policemen," he said.

M.J. Peterson, another speaker, spoke about the international laws relevant to NATO and US interference in Kosovo. According to Peterson, the United Nations Security Council has not authorized any air strikes, and thus the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) realizes that they are acting outside of the law.

"The NATO governments are not claiming that they have a legal right to beat up on Yugoslavia," she said. "They claim, rather, that the situation is such that they can not in good conscience stand aside and watch. They're saying, 'This is a kind of situation where the international community can not sit aside.'"

Lindsay McCarthy, a sophomore double–majoring in psychology and social thought and political economy, questioned NATO's inconsistency on human rights violations. "I was wondering why the international community was so concerned with the genocide in Kosovo, as opposed to the one in Rwanda," she said, "I don't understand the difference."

The audience laughed when Peterson responded, "That is the $64,000 question. Or maybe the $64 million question."

"People were warning about the genocide in Rwanda very early on," Peterson added, "but very little was accomplished. I think part of the reason you're seeing (the intervention) here is because we missed it in Rwanda."

Professor Karl Ryavec, another speaker, was asked if there was any possibility of the United States supporting a Serbian uprise against President Slobodan Milosevic. "It's rather late," he responded. "We're bombing Serbia. Milosevic is hiding now."

"I think we're just going to have to go down a long road," he added, "and it's going to be a terrible one."

Petar Blanusa, a graduate student in Mechanical Engineering, also spoke at the seminar. Blanusa is a native of Belgrade, Yugoslavia.

Blanusa took a very different view from any of the other speakers. "I object to using the word genocide," he said. "Where is the genocide here? ... There is no way that this is an ethnic cleansing. This is a propaganda issue."

He stated that NATO (which turned fifty years old earlier this month), "is behaving like a fifty–year old retard. It's saying, 'I'm so strong, I can do whatever I want.' That's the attitude of the NATO countries, and it's very wrong."

During the teach–in, volunteers solicited funds for a Kosovo relief fund run by the Red Cross. One student circulated a petition denouncing US involvement in the war.

While almost all in attendance were glad to see the University focus on the Kosovo crisis, there were some complaints that not enough basic information was given.

"(The teach–in) was a noble effort, but it was misguided," said Jessica Temeray, an English major at Smith College. "I think the speakers assumed that everyone knew the basics of what's going on now, and that wasn't necessarily the case."

She added, "It's a shame, but there are a lot of people ... who don't even know where Kosovo is."

Three charged with assault

Suspects apprehended for UMass rape, assault cases

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts campus was recently the scene of two incidents of sexual assault and one of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.

Three men were arrested Tuesday and arraigned yesterday in Hampshire County District Court in conjunction with these crimes, two were UMass students.

Paulo M. Barbosa, 22, of Dorchester, was arrested at Coolidge Residence Hall Tuesday on a warrant, the result of an investigation by UMass police following a report of an April 7 assault.

According to court records, the victim was confronting Barbosa in his Coolidge Residence Hall room about the return of property. He attempted to choke her, threw her onto the floor and stepped on her arm.

He threatened to throw her out the window, then revealed a folding knife and threatened to stab her in the chest, the records further stated.

Barbosa is being charged with assault and battery, assault with a dangerous weapon (folding knife), assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (shod foot) and witness intimidation — records state that he called the victim after the assault and warned her not to take action.

He was arraigned in Hampshire County District Court in Northampton yesterday. He pled not guilty to all charges and will be returning to court for a pre–trial hearing on April 29.

Christopher W. Morris also appeared in Hampshire County District Court yesterday. He was arrested Tuesday on a warrant, the result of a UMass police investigation of an acquaintance rape reported in Webster Residence Hall.

According to court records, Morris forced himself upon the victim. She dug her nails into his back but was unable to force him off of her. He told her she must not tell her roommate about the incident, the records stated.

Morris pled not guilty to the rape charge, and bail was set at $10,000 personal assurity, on condition that he have no contact with the victim.

Northampton police assisted UMass police in serving a warrant for the arrest of Luis A. Roman, 18, who lives on the "streets of Northampton," according to police reports. Roman was charged with statutory rape of a child, and arrested in Northampton early Tuesday evening.

According to police reports, "UMass police investigation has revealed that Roman committed statutory rape of a 14– year–old female victim while staying at the Campus Center Hotel in or around the first week of March."

Roman yesterday pled not guilty to the charge during his district court arraignment, and his bail was set at $5,000.

He will return to court on April 23 for a pre–trial hearing.

SGA meets Tafawa with resistance

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's agenda was packed with motions last night but almost nothing got done. The controversy started at the very beginning of the meeting and lasted up until there was a motion to adjourn.

After President Jeffery Howe picked his cabinet appointees, all that was left to do was have the senate pass motions and put the appointees into office. The first five appointees got voted in with little or no questioning. However, over an hour was spent on debate as to whether Malika Tafawa was qualified to be the new secretary of finance. Tafawa ran for trustee in the last elections but lost to Seth Avakian, Howe's running mate.

First Jim Eltringham, a senator from Southwest Residential Area debated against passing the motion that would appoint Tafawa. "This is the hardest thing to do. [Tafawa] deserves an appointment but I am not sure this is the right one. Other people who applied were more qualified," said Eltringham.

Senator Martin Shoji from Central Residential Area had also applied for the position of secretary of finance, he chose to speak on behalf of appointing Tafawa. "Let's make the right decision. I can't see why Malika couldn't do a good job. I have known her since my freshman year and it is really important that we support our president, he makes the decisions," said Shoji.

There was another two rounds of debate after the first and no agreement was reached. Aaron Saunders, a senator from Sylvan Residential Area next argued against Tafawa saying that she may not have been the most qualified person. "The question is not if she is qualified. We have a choice and if you feel like someone is more qualified you have a choice, and they need to be in that position," said Saunders.

Brenda Fitzpatrick, who will be replaced by the person who is appointed to this position, spoke next. "I find this a humorous debate. At this time last year the same arguments were being made against me. I was one of the best this Student Government has ever seen," said Fitzpatrick.

Debate really heated up when President Howe decided to speak for the motion to appoint Tafawa. "These people endorsed me as trustee [last year] now they are saying they don't trust my judgment," said Howe. "This back door politics is bogus." Howe was so enraged about some of the senators' actions that he began snapping at them when they asked a question out of order.

Finally Senator Paul Ferro from Commuter Area argued against the appointment. He said, "I don't like Sandra Brookley but I know she is qualified, she works hard and I voted for her [tonight]."

The senate remained divided when it was time to vote. It took three times for the vote to be accepted. The first two times there was question as to whether Speaker of the Senate Lisa Cook counted correctly. The third time, each senator had to say their vote aloud. Shoji and Brooslin changed their votes from abstentions to ayes, which made the motion to appoint Tafawa pass. Tafawa finally was sworn in and she is officially the secretary of finance.

Along with Tafawa, five other appointees were sworn in. Jared Brooslin was sworn in as secretary of public policy and relations. Brookley was sworn in as secretary of the registry. Eleanor Gerome was sworn in as the new attorney general. Sheila Tunney was sworn in a secretary of administrative affairs and Linda Garvie was sworn in as secretary of university policy.

Resource Network is looking at ways to increase retention

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

An examination the perceptions and realities that are causing students to leave the University of Massachusetts before graduating, was undertaken by the Resource Network yesterday afternoon.

"There's a perception... among these students that this is not a welcoming place," said Gary Bernhard, director of University Without Walls and a member of the Resource Network steering committee, of students who don't attend UMass after being accepted.

Bernhard said the perception of being unwelcome is especially common among Asian, Latino, African, Native American (ALANA) students.

"We have an issue not only with ALANA student retention but all students," said Linda Marchesani, manager of Training and Development.

But some of the participants in the discussion, composed solely of faculty and staff, said those perceptions were based on facts.

Tom Colish, senior staff attorney at Student Legal Services said he had "serious concerns" about how students are treated in the dorms and that there may be racial and ethnic biases in the judicial system.

A recent report about student satisfaction with campus services was distributed to the group.

The survey, done by Gary D. Malaney, director of Student Affairs Research, Information and Systems, divided students by race.

In regards to their financial aid package, 60 percent of black students reported being "very or somewhat dissatisfied," along with 55.5 percent of multi–racial students, 52.9 percent of Latino students, 44.7 percent of Asian students and 37.3 percent of white students.

When the students surveyed were asked if they felt faculty were concerned about the undergraduate's academic progress, 4.3 percent of black students "strongly agreed", and 6.6 percent of Latino students, 11.6 of multi–racial students, 16.0 percent of whites and 17.1 percent of Asians felt the same.

The survey included 96 black students, 105 Asian students, 43 multi–racial students, 76 Latino students and 521 white students. Native American students were excluded because only nine responded.

Grant Ingle, director of Human Relations, said a new survey is due out soon and would show greater satisfaction among students with administrative offices.

"I think they're moving in the right direction," Ingle said.

One reason students expressed dissatisfaction, Bernhard said, was that UMass' resources are not connected.

"It's like a patchwork... It's not a whole anything," Bernhard said. "(A) level of coordination... [would give] some sense that this place knows what it's doing."

The group discussed possible ways to increase student satisfaction on campus which would ultimately raise student retention rates.

Coish suggested "taking the bull by the horns" to solve student retention problems, and assess across campus what is working to keep students at UMass and what isn't.

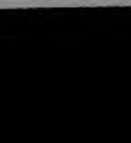
Marchesani said having a "University 101" class that prepares students for college life that would stress the importance of going to class, taking notes, taking tests and staying with classes throughout the semester.

Having a University 101 class plus more academic advisors and more staff in academic departments would help the situation, according to Karen Lederer, chief undergraduate advisor for women's studies.

Some individuals said students are like customers and should be asked what services they want on campus.

But Roland Chilton, a sociology professor felt that "is just a totally wrong approach." He said professors are there to certify students for graduation and help them learn. Treating them just as customers would not help students do that.

The Resource Network will be meeting again April 28. The discussions are open to everyone, including students.



"The more people from different constituencies that come to these meetings the better it is," Bernhard said.

to create a new, as yet unnamed scholarship program.

"We're going to pool both funds together," he said. "We will allocate money from that combined pool. The money's going to be the same."

Cevallos has assured that the University will use race as a factor in determining the recipients of these scholarships; it will be only be used as one factor among many, though.

The Graduate School has altered its fellowship program, as well, by using a new definition of "diversity." This definition requires that the student be "under-represented" in his/her discipline nationally. This under-representation need not be based on race.

According to Dr. Judith Toyama, the director of Graduate Minority Recruitment and Retention, there are currently four different types of graduate fellowships offered by the University — Graduate School Fellowships, Graduate School Scholarships, Opportunity Fellowships, and Diversity Fellowships.

However, according to Dr. Toyama, the new definition of diversity did not apply to the Diversity Fellowships offered by the University this spring. "We're doing it the same way we did it before," she said.

A memo circulated in October 1998 by the Entomology department further suggests that Diversity Fellowships have been offered on a race-exclusive basis in the past. The memo announced the creation of a $10,000 Diversity Fellowship "targeted for an African-American masters or doctoral student."

"This Fellowship offer is not available for foreign students, but only for African-American students," the memo further stated.

If Diversity Fellowships were offered this spring under their previous definition, this stands in direct contrast to Scott's original statement denying the existence of race- exclusive scholarships.

Furthermore, the new definition of diversity was not announced until after Scott made his statement.

Toyama did state, however, that the new diversity definition would "probably be used in the future," which would eliminate all race-exclusive scholarship and fellowship programs.

Hate crime victims get new hope: locals offer help

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

The worst experience can turn out to be the best, according to local hate crime victims Robert Green and Jimmy Tarr.

Re-visualizing their victimization, Green and Tarr, along with Not in Our Town Coalition member Judy Glaser, spoke last night in a forum on hate crimes about their experiences and the responses of their communities. The forum was sponsored by the Jewish Student Union's (JSU) Holocaust Commemorative Committee. Both Green, of Amherst, and Tarr, of Hatfield, saw "explosions" of support which transformed their views of their towns.

"They stepped out beyond 'I feel bad'," Green said. "It gave me a new respect for people."

Green, the owner of Amherst Typewriter, faced a series of what he viewed as racist actions relating to his business, beginning with a 250 percent increase in rent from a new landlord. Green was then evicted from the building in which his store was located.

"People came to me and really embraced me," Green said. "They asked, 'What can I do?'"

MELINDA NORES / COLLEGIAN

Robert Green and Jimmy Tarr spoke at a hate crime form yesterday.

Community members raised some of Green's moving costs, and moved his business out of its first location within two hours.

Green said he "had high expectations" for his business in its new location, but a 2 a.m. call from the Amherst police brought him face to face with the reality of vandalism.

"Windows were smashed, computers were smashed, antique typewriters were smashed," Green said.

Entering his store the next day, Green wrote "Why?" on a piece of paper and put it in the store window.

"It caught on," Green said. "People were putting posters in the windows of their cars."

"I cried a lot — just from joy," Green said. "People kept building me."

Tarr said his community was not as quick to respond to the hate crimes occurring in their town.

Tarr said that two years ago, on Halloween, "a bunch of kids cruised the streets dressed as the Ku Klux Klan. No one really did anything about it."

A year later, shaving cream swastikas were painted on a woman's lawn. Tarr said that two women "eradicated" the swastikas, and little was said about the graffiti.

Within two weeks, "things started oozing around town," Tarr said.

"People decided that this was wrong," Tarr said. "Something had to be done."

Tarr and his community members organized a rally for Thanksgiving weekend. The Saturday of the rally, three swastikas were painted on Tarr's van.

People began to realize that "this is no longer shaving cream," Tarr said. "This is a hate crime."

Tarr said that the crime "spurred awareness" and brought out responses from "people who normally wouldn't respond."

"It wasn't about what happened to me," Tarr said. "It was about the community standing up and saying that this is not acceptable."

Crisis gets ugly

Serbs keep tormenting refugees

By Mort Rosenblum
Associated Press

KUKES, Albania — By now, a half-million tragic stories later, the ugly picture is getting steadily uglier: It is one of Serb terror and murder ripping deep Albanian roots from Kosovo soil.

As NATO pursues its relentless campaign in the air, Serbs probe the Albanian border and pepper a no-man's land with mines to show they are masters on the ground.

"They are now everywhere," wailed Zade Haridinaj, among at least 2,000 refugees who crossed yesterday from Drenica, a last redoubt of the Kosovo Liberation Army. Her group hid in the mountains for a month before riding a tractor convoy to Albania. "The last thing we saw was Serbs beating our men to death, maybe 300 or 400 of them, including boys over 14," she said. Another 4,000 refugees, mostly women, were following on foot, she said. Even with tractors, the trip took three days. Five children died of exposure in her cluster of tractors.

Her 84-year-old mother-in-law, Hafize Haridinaj, described how Serb paramilitary units shot to death 150 men suspected of KLA ties on March 27 in the nearby village of Izmir. Zade said her brother was among them.

Many in the group said Serbs placed their tanks and artillery near refugee convoys, apparently to discourage NATO pilots from bombing them.

On Tuesday, Naser Berisha, 36, was among nearly 4,000 refugees who straggled into the Albanian border town of Kukes. They had hidden for two weeks, hoping to return to their villages near Pristina, capital of Kosovo.

Serb snipers took pot shots at their convoy of open tractors and cars, killing a 12-year-old boy and wounding his mother, the refugees said.

Near a military camp at Djakovica, Berisha said he watched a woman resist rape by Serbs only to be shot dead in front of her husband and children. "I dared not leave my car to try to help," he said, still visibly distraught. "What could I do?"

New details from recent arrivals dovetail with stories told repeatedly since late March when the first waves of refugees streamed out of Kosovo. More than 300,000 have come through two Albanian border posts. At least another 200,000 went to Macedonia and Montenegro.

"The routine is that armed Serbs arrive and tell everyone to put their valuables and car keys on the kitchen table and to be gone within 30 minutes," said Maureen Capps of San Diego, a Catholic Relief Services aid worker, in Kosovo since last fall. Other foreign aid workers and Kosovar refugees offer similar accounts.

"It has been completely orchestrated since summer, with troops, police and the paramilitary," said Keith Ursel, an American U.N. World Food Program officer.

A common pattern, he said, was for Serbs to frighten refugees away from their villages with shelling, then call in trucks by radio to empty out houses, which were then torched.

Expulsions reached a peak after the October offensive and then subsided. They resumed on a massive scale - backed by army tanks — after NATO planes attacked Serbia.

At first, Serbs targeted KLA strongholds populated by family members of ethnic Albanian fighters in the hills. Then they fanned out, emptying most towns and villages and burning many of them. Those who resisted were persuaded with cluster bombs, mortar shells and sniper fire, the refugees said. Suspected guerrillas were arrested or executed on the spot. Beatings, sometimes fatal, were common. Theft by Serb police was systematic.

Reports of rape are growing, foreign medical workers said, although shame makes victims reluctant to speak. People are killed with no evident pattern, and farm animals, dogs and cats are put to death as a matter of course.

Often Serbs drive into villages in buses or police vehicles not easily identifiable by NATO pilots.

By now, according to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, fewer than a million ethnic Albanians are left in Kosovo, and nearly half of them are displaced, hiding in forests and mountains. No one knows how many displaced people remain in Kosovo, but 400,000 seems a reasonable estimate, said UNHCR spokesman Jacques Franquin.

Candidates protest rigged pres. elections

Candidates withdraw from Algerian vote to protest fraud

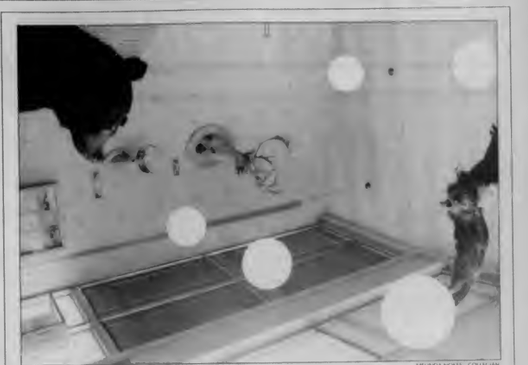
By Elaine Ganley
Associated Press

ALGIERS, Algeria — Algeria's presidential election was thrown into chaos yesterday after six of the seven presidential candidates announced they were withdrawing to protest fraud in early voting.

The move leaves only one candidate in the running — Abdelaziz Bouteflika, who is widely believed to have the support of the powerful military, the real source of power in Algeria since its independence from France in 1962.

The election today is meant to give Algeria its first civilian president since 1965 and reconcile a nation reeling from an Islamic insurgency that has killed some 75,000 people in seven years. The unrest was sparked when the military aborted the 1992 legislative elections.

Until now, candidates, authorities and even a banned Muslim fundamentalist party had seen the election as the turning point for a brutalized nation, encouraged by promises by outgoing President Liamine Zeroual that the vote would be clean.



Constitutional experts said according to the law, the vote would go on as planned — with only one candidate. There was no immediate reaction from the government or from Bouteflika.

The six other candidates said in a joint statement that they rejected in advance the eventual winner and called for peaceful protest marches on tomorrow.

Promises for a fair election "have not been respected on the ground, and so we decide on a collective withdrawal from the presidential election," they said after meeting yesterday. "We will not recognize the legitimacy of this election."

Their fraud allegations centered on early voting in mobile stations set up in the vast Saharan Desert, and in special precincts set up for soldiers. Early voting was allowed for soldiers who were scheduled to work protect polling stations.

Among their charges, the candidates said ballots were improperly handled and candidates' monitors were expelled from some polling places. They said Bouteflika supporters were allowed a rally in one town after campaigning was officially closed, and that supporters of Ahmed Taleb Ibrahimi, a candidate with Islamic sympathies, were arrested in some areas.

NATO balks at German plan

By Jeffrey Ulbrich
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — In a drive to bring peace to Kosovo, Germany unveiled a plan yesterday calling for a one-day suspension of airstrikes if Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic begins withdrawing troops from the province. European Union leaders, however, set the idea aside in favor of a similar initiative by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

There was no indication that Milosevic would agree to any of the proposals.

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, current president of the 15-nation European Union, convened a special EU summit yesterday to discuss Kosovo, but said the German plan was not directly addressed. Instead, the EU leaders united behind a five-point U.N. initiative announced Friday.

"The heads of state and government reiterate their determination not to tolerate the killings and deportations in Kosovo and believe that the use of the severest measures, including military action, has been both necessary and warranted," Schroeder said.

Eleven of the EU's 15 members are also members of NATO, which has been bombing Yugoslavia to cripple Serbia's ability to crack down on ethnic Albanians who have been fighting for independence. The EU leaders said Annan's five points summed up the demands of the international community.

The leaders stressed "it is now up to the Yugoslav authorities to fully accept the international demands and begin immediately with their implementation," Schroeder said.

The EU, he said, reaffirmed its support for a political settlement based on the agreement negotiated at Rambouillet, France, in February — signed by the Kosovo Albanians and rejected by the Serbs. He said the EU was prepared to run the interim administration of Kosovo under such a plan.

Annan, who said he came to Brussels "to listen and to explore with the leaders ways to intensify diplomatic efforts," said he had no plans to go to Belgrade to discuss either initiative with Milosevic.

The leaders apparently wanted more time to study the German proposal.

Annan's initiative, announced last week in Geneva, called for:

• An immediate end to the campaign of intimidation and expulsion of civilians.

• Ceasing all military and paramilitary activities in Kosovo and withdraw these forces.

• Accepting unconditionally the return of all refugees and displaced people to their homes.

• Accepting the deployment of an international military force to help in the return of refugees and delivery of aid.

• Permitting the international community to verify compliance. Those are very similar to NATO's own conditions for halting the bombing.

Under the German plan, presented earlier in Bonn, NATO would suspend its airstrikes on Yugoslavia for 24 hours to give Milosevic time to begin moving his troops out of the province, and permanently suspend the attacks once the pullout is complete. The proposals call for a U.N. military force to move in as Yugoslav army and special police forces withdraw. That would be followed by a return of the hundreds of thousands of ethnic Albanian refugees from Albania and Macedonia and an interim U.N. administration of Kosovo.

Letter from Greece

How often do we hear the voices of Europe in the Kosovo Crisis? A few days ago I received a letter that turned my quiet protests into an inspired rage.

I have written to Vivi in Thessaloniki, Greece, since the age of 12, sharing with her my loves, hopes, dreams and losses. A few days ago, Vivi shared with me her greatest fears, which have spawned from the actions of the United States.

First and foremost, Vivi asked me to tell everyone that they may have been misinformed. Macedonia, the site where supposedly many Albanian refugees have fled, is, in fact, located in Greece. The Macedonia the press refers to is a part of Skopia in the Former Yugoslavian Republic of Macedonia (FYROM). Vivi explained, "Unfortunately my country [Greece] needs that kind of help," and "it would mean a lot to me if you explained about where Macedonia and FYROM is."

She also wrote: "I'm really furious about that and, of course, with what Clinton does. It is a matter concerning Yugoslavia. An inside matter. I'm sorry but your country has no right in all that... and I'm afraid of what the Turkish will say again and do. They are so barbaric! They don't have any respect for human rights. I suppose you have seen what they did just a few years ago in Cyprus. Why doesn't Clinton do something about that? Its all about interests and politics. Not just for the USA but for everyone. I hate war. Can't they solve everything in peace?"

I wish I had answers for Vivi. All I can do is nod in agreement. Clinton was mistaken to think that it is America's duty to go into Kosovo. This is not supported by our history or the opinions of my peers. I don't want my name attached to the casualties of this war. I know well that the people who are dying are the children and elders fleeing from Kosovo. It is cold and they are hungry and vulnerable. People might say that the Serbs would get to them anyway, but our war isn't solving anything.

"Nostradamus wrote that in 2000 our world will be destroyed, beginning from the Balkans, a war in Balkans which will grow bigger and bigger."

Veronica MacDonald

And what about Aleksinac, a small mining town of 20,000 people? NATO accidentally bombed them on April 5th. At least seven people died and 50 others were injured. Did these people deserve to die? Does everyone have to live in fear of NATO planes flying overhead? I thought they were supposed to be the heroes, but all they are doing is perpetuating violence. Some people in Aleksinac even yelled, "Clinton Nazi!"

Vivi added, "Have you ever heard of Nostradamus? He was a prophet. Everything he has written so far has become true. I don't want to believe it, but he wrote that in 2000 our world will be destroyed. And that catastrophe will begin from the Balkans, a war in the Balkans which will grow bigger and bigger. I hope with all my heart that all this is a foolish thought. I really don't believe in these kinds of things... I'm not saying all this because I'm a fanatic or something; I really love my country and respect its great history.

Nowadays not a lot of people do. Its midnight and I'm watching now the attacks in Kosovo. I feel so sorry for these people. Why doesn't anyone else?"

Vivi, I'd like to tell you that everything is going to be alright, but my country is too blind to see its mistakes and too stubborn to back out of Kosovo. I hope Nostradamus is wrong. And I hope to meet you someday and look back on all of this as if it had never happened. No one deserves to die in a war we were not meant to create. Genocide is a truly horrible thing, but violence begets violence. And when did the American public have a say in this atrocity?

Bodies are lying everywhere on the refugee trails, and WE are a part of that. I don't believe I gave my consent to Clinton. Did you?

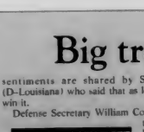
Big trouble in little D.C.

There is a lot going on in politics right now, with the conflict in Kosovo, Congress returning from their spring recess and the Susan McDougal trial, which carries various political implications itself.

Well, congress came back from their spring break, some of it spent in Daytona, Cancun and South Padre, but some of the Congressmen and women spent time visiting the Balkan region knowing that they would need to prepare for debate on the subject when they returned home.



Much of Congress began debate on the subject of NATO airstrikes, the possible use of ground troops and exit strategy of the United States from the situation in Kosovo.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert released a statement saying that there would be notes on Kosovo this week but people should expect them within the month.

Senior House members who did go to Cancun will be expected to travel to the region later this week to see the status of the mission. They will be looking into several questions that they have, as well as those the public has. One of the bigger questions is about what this operation will cost the U.S.

Much of the debate that began Monday and Tuesday revolved around the use of ground troops, yet the Clinton Administration says that they don't expect NATO or Congress to request the use of ground troops.

Sen. John McCain (R-Arizona) is looking to present a resolution to Congress authorizing the president to use whatever means necessary to end this conflict. The question you should have is, what does that mean, exactly? McCain just feels that the conflict should be over. His sentiments are shared by Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-Louisiana) who said that as long as we're in it, let's win it.

Paul Teves

Defense Secretary William Cohen is slightly worried that Congress isn't looking at all the facts. Cohen is expected to speak before Congress on the matter and will tell them that the airstrikes are working and that NATO hasn't made any plans as of yet to send in ground troops, and that the Congress should hold off on the resolutions for ground troops. This resolution is expected to be pushed by Rep. Tom Campbell (R-California) who is looking to introduce a resolution to declare war on Yugoslavia — or if that fails, he will introduce a resolution that would make the president withdraw troops involved in the NATO mission within a month. Both resolutions are expected to be voted on before the end of April.

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) visited the Balkans while on break and said that it would be premature of Congress to send in troops, because he says the airstrikes are indeed working.

Congress has several other things facing it, including a vote on an $800 billion dollar tax cut over the next decade. The question here is whether or not Medicare and Social Security can wait?

They will also try to pass a budget, one of the big questions there revolves around whether some of the huge surplus should be used to save Medicare. This will be a heavily debated topic and the answer is fairly obvious: you need to save health care for older Americans before you start cutting taxes for the wealthy.

Then both parties have terrible legislation which they will try and pass, which they can use in upcoming elections.

The Republicans are expected to try and pass a constitutional amendment saying that you would need three- fifths of a vote in both Houses to raise taxes but that is not likely to get the two-thirds majority. This is an election ploy. The Democrats have an election ploy of their own involving revamping campaign finance, and the Democrats will be trying again to limit spending, which is also unlikely to pass.

"...you need to save health care for older Americans before you start cutting taxes for the wealthy."

Finally, Congress will hear testimony from shady independent counsel Kenneth Starr as to why the Independent Counsel Act should continue to exist. It will be interesting to see what the Congress does in terms of the Independent Counsel Act, but it depends on who becomes president, if the Republican Congress sees Gore winning the presidency, they will likely keep on the Independent Counsel Act, but if not, they might lose the independent lawyer.

The Susan McDougal outcome, which just came in, bodes well for the Clintons, especially for the first lady, who is seeking a political career in New York State. U.S. District Judge George Howard Jr. declared a mistrial on the two counts of criminal contempt, following a not guilty verdict on the obstruction charges against McDougal stemming from the fact that she didn't want to testify before a Federal Grand Jury in 1996 and 1998 in relation to Whitewater.

McDougal's defense team said that this was a perfect form of repudiation of Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr.

"If anything should put a stake through the heart of Kenneth Starr, this should be it," said Mark Geragos, McDougal's defense attorney. "This guy should pack up and get the heck out of Arkansas — and do it now."

Nothing will hurt Starr's chances of getting the Independent Counsel Act renewed more than two failures within months of each other. He should indeed give it up and try not to be a complete loser and go back to being a judge.

Awe, just retire, will you, you have left the nation with quite a legacy for failure.

•In a randomly stupid portion of politics, Dan Quayle decided to run for president, despite the fact that there are 10 other candidates who have a better shot at the Republican nomination. Sometimes you just have to ask yourself, why?

Big punisher

There are some people on this campus that should not be here. Now, before you start thinking that this is another boring column about affirmative action, just calm down because it ain't nothin' like that. Before I came to this glorious university, I anticipated meeting a wide variety of people. I knew that I would get along with a lot of them and I also knew that there would be some people that I wouldn't like too much. Indeed, I was right. I have met people who fit both categories.

"I have decided how these annoying people should spend the rest of eternity. Obviously, the punishment for horse cops is going to have to do with a saddle."

However, there is a certain "class" of people whom I did not anticipate meeting and upon encountering them I wish that I never had. This class includes people whose main purpose in being here seems to be annoying the hell out of the everyday student. Perhaps these people were a one-time April Fool's joke that God played on this campus. Only, to be fair, I have decided how these people should spend the rest of eternity because of the way they have annoyed you and me. Of course, if you are one of the people that I discuss in the following paragraphs then you should not include yourself in the "you" of the previous sentence.

The first and most annoying group of people whom I least expected to meet on this campus is the staff of parking services. There isn't anyone here who likes them. They're mean little pests — a lot like mosquitoes. The only differences are that instead of leaving little bug bites they leave little yellow tickets and instead of taking blood they take money. Don't, however, take them lightly because if you don't pay your ticket on time then they will be out for blood.

As soon as the people from parking services die they should go straight to hell. In hell, they would undergo a punishment that will suit the mistakes they made during their time on earth. The first step for them would be to get flattened by a steamroller. As soon as they are as flat and as thin as paper the steamrolling would be over. Next, the ticket-givers would be placed on a conveyer belt where they would each be stamped by a giant stamp. The stamp would be in the pattern of a parking ticket. From then on for the rest of eternity they would be filled out like the giant parking ticket they are.

The only catch is that they wouldn't be getting filled out by a smooth ball point pen. Satan's little helpers have the largest tattoo guns ever made. This way the ticket writers would be feeling the eternal burn that each one of their victims felt when they initially saw the yellow envelope on their windshield.

The next class of people who will have to endure a special punishment for eternity are cops on horses. I don't think that these cops are worse than the others, nor do I think that they dislike us as students more than the other cops. However, there are two things that do set them apart from the rest of the UMPD. The first thing is that they made the horses become cops without even asking them. I'm sure that they just put some confiscated cocaine or heroine in the horses to get them hooked, and now no matter how much they want to quit the force, they can't because they're addicted.

Dan Viens

The second thing that sets the horse cops apart from the rest is that they look so pompous sitting up there on their big horses. I didn't think that it was possible to look or act more pompous than most UMass cops already do, but somehow the horse cops manage to do it.

Obviously, the eternal punishment for horse cops is going to have to do with a saddle. First things first, though. The cops are going to have to lather their entire body with baby oil. This oil, combined with the fiery flames of hell should give the cop a nice bacony aroma. Next, the cop will have to strap on a nice big saddle. Then some random drunken college kid who happens to have the misfortune of spending eternity in hell will have the task of riding the cop like a bucking bronco. Finally the cop will have to wear virtual reality goggles that will have him eternally chasing underage kids with open beers. However, since it is hellish virtual reality, the underage kid, for once, will never be caught. This punishment should knock them off their high horses.

The last class of annoying people that I will mention (this is not to say that there aren't more annoying people on this campus) is the militant resident assistant. There are some R.A.s who take their jobs and themselves far to seriously. Some R.A.s tend to forget that they, too, are students and not some deified group of beings. I understand that they have a job to do. They can't let things get out of hand. I mean, obviously, they should report violence, and if kids are blowing bong hits out into the hall, then, of course, something should be done. But why not tell a kid to dump out a beer instead of writing him up and subjecting him to hours of counseling from someone who is convinced he is an alcoholic because he drank a beer.

For these R.A.s the punishment isn't nearly as elaborate as the others. They should just be shot dead and wiped from existence. If they had this staring them in the face then they would calm down a bit and this would make for an entirely happier student body.

This concludes my eternal punishments for now, but just because you are not mentioned you best watch yourself because The Punisher is always looking for new annoyances.

The TastyDish On Theme Restaurants

Hors d'ourves

The concept behind concept restaurants

Perhaps the public's everlasting desire for more entertainment could be the reason for a recent boom in the amount of restaurants that are serving up fun as well as food. In the past few years, there have been a number of different chains with pretty much the same purpose. Whether you're the type of person who enjoys music, movies, sports, or even an occasional trip to the rainforests, the one thing you can be sure of with these types of restaurants is that by the time you leave, there will be a hole in your wallet bigger than crater that would be formed from the Planet Hollywood globe landing in your back yard.

Despite the long lines that form from waits that can be in excess of three hours, these restaurants are so well planned that they can almost guarantee that they will be a huge success. It seems like the least important element in some of these eateries are the food that they serve. At all of them, you can purchase T-shirts and outrageously overpriced memorabilia to remember your trip. So if all these things are taken into account, where is the absolute best place to go for a fun place to eat? Here are some ideas.

The Best:

1.) The Rainforest Cafe

The motto here is "A wild place to shop and eat," and that pretty much sums up the entire chain. The building that the restaurant is set in is split into two sections; the restaurant, and the store. The store usually takes up about one-third of the building, and is always in front of the restaurant. The idea here is to get customers to spend as much money as possible before they ever enter the restaurant. As a matter of fact, most Rainforest Cafes are set inside malls where people already have spending on their minds. The two most popular Rainforest Cafes are both in Disney World, with one in the Disney Village Marketplace, and the other in Disney's Animal Kingdom Theme Park.

Once inside the restaurant you'll be seated with mechanical animals and plants from the rainforest that move, make noise, and are by far the center of attention. The food at Rainforest Cafe is absolutely exquisite. The highlights here i

Rating the Restaurants

At the beginning of the 90's, the American dining experience as we knew it took a dramatic change for the better with the advent of the concept restaurant. Up until this time, many restaurants served the same typical cuisine based on the region of the country that you lived in. With the introduction of these new concept restaurants, many Americans were able to better experience the cuisine of other regions of the country as well as the world.

Also accompanying this introduction of new cuisine was a new, relaxed and fun atmosphere so that the patron had the most enjoyable dining experience possible. The concept restaurant was sprouted out of the advent of the service age, and restaurant patrons wanting more than a meal out of their trip to the restaurant.

Today, these concept restaurants are everywhere. Many of us know these restaurants as T.G.I. Friday's, Chili's, Bertucci's, Applebee's, Joe's American Grill, Chi Chi's, The Olive Garden and even our own local Pub. In the past few months I have had the opportunity to dine at these establishments. Throughout my dining experience I have been both impressed and disgusted with the food and service I have received in these establishments. Everyone has their own opinion in deciding what they feel is a satisfactory dining experience, I just hope that you value mine.

1) T.G.I. Friday's

I found my dinning experience in T.G.I. Friday's extremely enjoyable. The atmosphere was that of a party, everyone was having a good time, enjoying good company, good food, and great service. The T.G.I. Friday's menu is priced very well, most dinner entrees priced between $8.95 and $15.95. I would definitely suggest any of Friday's grilled items. In my comparison to other concept restaurants Friday's ranks the best. A+

2) Chili's

In the past few months I have had the opportunity dine at this establishment. I

Sink into Wilco's new Teeth

COURTESY BETH HERZHOFF

Wilco innovates on their latest release, Summer Teeth.

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

SUMMER TEETH
Wilco
Warner/Reprise

Some albums invite you in. Coming on the heels of last year's offerings from Liz Phair and R.E.M., Wilco gives us another album filled with wonderful textures and hidden sounds. Like Up and whitechocolatespacegg, Summer Teeth bravely reimagines pop with surprising sounds at every turn.

Moving away from the neo-country influence evident on their other two albums, AM and the critically-hailed double album Being There, Wilco embraces pop sounds closer to the Beach Boys than to Hank Williams, Sr. Filling the album with keyboards, bells, timpani, doo-doo-doo backing vocals and strange effects (at one point, birds chirp), the band has taken the normal pop song and added layers to it, much like the Beach Boys on Pet Sounds. While they may have abandoned (but not completely) their country flavor that won them a loyal following, they continue to tap into music's history, drawing out solid songs that they've redone for the new age.

That's not to say this is the ground-breaking album that Pet Sounds is considered to be, but it's definitely an early contender for best album of the year. Wilco blends music that has a frantic-pop easiness with a darker lyrical intent. "She's a Jar" swims in pretty chamberlains and keyboards which hide the fact that the song is about a wife beater, a fact revealed in the very last line. Later, Tweedy sings "I dreamed about killing you again last night/ And it felt alright to me," to begin the absolutely beautiful "Via Chicago" (where he later sings "But the wind blew me back via Chicago/ In the middle of the night/ And all without fight/ At the crush of veils and starlight"). It doesn't come out as a shocking statement so much as an honest revelation, delivered in a weary, casual tone.

Tweedy's haunted and haunting lyrics hide behind the music, like a narrator welcoming you into his home to relate dark tales of his past. The abstract, sometimes disassociated lyrics add to the darkness. After repeated listenings, one is left to wonder, and sometimes worry, "What the hell is this guy talking about?" (The opening lines of "I'm Always In Love — "Why, I wonder is my heart full of holes/ And the feeling goes but my hair keeps growing" — come to mind.)

Tweedy seems concerned with the ravages of time. On the title track, he sings about a man growing old alone: "And every evening when he gets home/ To make his summer and eat it alone/ His black shirt cries/ While his shoes get cold." On the next, "In a Future Age," he tells us that "Some trees will blend/ And some will fall/ But then again/ So will us all." The whole album feels like a man looking back on missed chances with cynicism and regret.

A nice blend of songs that rock out like "I LT" and some that arrive like a gentle touch, such as "How To Fight Loneliness," give the album a balance of tempos and emotions. These are not simple, straightforward songs musically. "Via Chicago," for example, builds on a simple acoustic guitar to begin with, but later adds drums, piano, banjo and feedback. The song threatens to fall apart at one point, as the beat fades, while only the vocal melody holds the song together.

This is an album of moments, of things that creep up on you without explanation or warning. From the Theremin-like sounds on "I'm Always In Love" to the birds that welcome "Summer Teeth," these are the little things that make the album so well crafted.

In the end, how do you explain an album that's beauty is not easily identifiable? This album feels like laying on fresh- cut grass in late spring, with the sun warm on your face, or like being in love. But it's so much more than that. And that's the highest compliment I can give it. A

Examining Material, Space

By Jason Springer
Collegian Correspondent

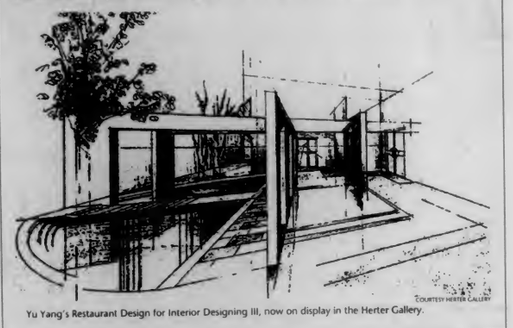
MATERIAL, SPACE
Herter Art Gallery

Most people, I assume, are fairly oblivious to an objective understanding of the spaces which they inhabit. Different environments become merely backdrops; areas within which people simply function. The particular qualities which compose each space are often unnoticed — qualities which, for the most part, were meticulously planned in the minds of interior designers/architects.

The exhibit, Material, Space, now on display at the Herter Gallery, is an annual exhibition which features the work of students in the Interior Design and Architecture Studies Program of the Art Department at UMass. The program has been gaining a prominent reputation in its field; a claim that is strongly complemented by the variety and complexity of the student projects represented.

Organized by the program professors Lugosch, Pollin, Kinoshita, Gather and Krupazynski, the exhibition encompasses the application of materials in relation to themes in the construction of spaces; hence the title, Material, Space.

One theme being presented is a unification of interior design and architecture. This merger gives students a more complete perspective on a structures entire function within its space. Also stressed throughout the works are an importance in the building of models. As professor Pollin stated, "Model building gives a student hands on, tactile, understanding of which materials and tools will best express their ideas."



A third current which runs throughout the exhibit is a strong emphasis on creative, concept driven design through a compilation of materials to form a coherent habitable space. Professor Lugosch said, "We have tried to encouraged a cross-over between art and architecture and to encourage a greater awareness in the communication of concepts through drawing and models. Also important is the assemblage of interesting materials to create a coherent or functional space."

There is a spectrum of projects in the exhibit which range from the construction of purely abstract spaces to the designing of functional public spaces. For example, the series of works called Curved Box is a rendering of two opposing abstract concepts and displays their different actualization's in physical space.

The exhibit also contains works which are based on inhabitable spaces but experiment with the conventions of such spaces. An example is the work Retail Project, by Hsun-Hung Lee, which explores the concept of line and incorporates unusual materials into the structure. On the other end of the spectrum are drawings and models for a variety of functional public and semi-public spaces such as the designs for bus stops and restaurants. One series of works actually has an application to the spaces here at UMass. It was a competition to build a display in the Campus Center for the Distinguished Teaching Awards. The works were striking in their range of material and diversity of concept.

When asked what she hoped a viewer would take form the exhibit, Professor Lugosch replied, "I would hope that the exhibit opens a viewers mind to the many spaces in which they live and work. And from that realization it gives them the language to verbalize and express their own concepts and thus create their own personal space."

The final day of the exhibit is today. The Gallery will be holding a closing reception during which John Kells will speak. John Kells is a successful graduate of the program and is currently a member of the architectural firm ADD Inc. of Cambridge, MA. The reception will be at Herter Auditorium at 5 p.m.

CAMBRIDGE — America needs these guys. The cramped confines of a basement venue just do not do them justice. Get them outside for a summer show. Sign them up for Lollapalooza or H.O.R.D.E. These guys could be huge.

Bring It On, their debut, was one of last year's more remarkable discs. This English band creates a truly American record full of bluesy sounds. The magic was the main vocalist's gravelly voice, something along the liner of Tom Waits or Eddie Vedder.

Nothing like a CD with a booklet full of paintings to create forced mystique. Nothing like a live show to shatter it. On stage were a bunch of very young-looking guys — not the Delta bluesmen one would expect.

Things took a while to jell. The initial songs lacked magic. The crowd waited. Ben Ottewell did wow the crowd with his singing voice, but he never spoke. Between-song banter was left to Tom Gray, sometimes vocalist, multi- instrumentalist and emcee. Once he was in control of his nerves and the band had warmed to their instruments, the guys got a swampy groove going — a sound worthy of supporting Ottewell's gift.

The sold-out show was jammed with music industry folk and dedicated fans, who sang along with the guys on the very catchy "Got Myself Arrested." Not too shabby for an as-yet-unnoticed band here in the States. The album won the coveted Mercury Music Prize in England last year, which intensified the buzz over here tenfold. The sounds of slide and acoustic guitar traded off with more free-form instrumentals peppered with all sorts of percussion. They did mellow out for a while with "Tijuana Lady", an ode to Mexico with hip references to Robert Rodriguez' El Mariachi and Desperado.

The two-song encore was the highlight of the show. Ottewell stunned everyone with his delicate rendition of "Make No Sound". The crowd finally started dancing as the evening closed with the turbo version of "Trippin' Picadilly", the only sample-laden track. The band jammed for some time before giving the crowd a friendly "cheers".

4AD artists Mojave 3 got the evening off to a subdued beginning. The 45-minute set relied on material from their second release, Out Of Tune. Neil Halstead, formerly of shoegazer favorites Slowdive, delivered the words to such songs as "Baby's Gone Home" and "Some Kinda Angel" in his mellow drone. The set's closer, "Mercy" from their debut, Ask Me Tomorrow, made it all worth it. Halstead's voice was highlighted by the vocal accompaniment of bandmate Rachel Goswell as the song gradually grew into something special.

Gomez continues touring the small clubs of America for the next month or so, winding up at Seattle's Crocodile Cafe (Will Eddie show up?). They have a funky groove that has been all the rage here for some time. Keep an eye on Gomez. They can really bring it on.

~Film Clips~

A selection of films playing in the local area:

ANALYZE THIS (dir Harold Ramis, with Robert De Niro, Billy Crystal, playing at Mountain Farms) Perhaps best described as a mixture of Donnie Brasco, Goodfellas and Naked Gun, Analyze This looks at both the comic and dark aspects of the mob movie, instead of going for all out satire, and is almost saved by the dead-on performances of Robert De Niro and Billy Crystal. C+ (Adam Martignetti)

BLAST FROM THE PAST (dir Hugh Wilson, with Brendan Fraser, Alicia Silverstone, playing at Springfield Cinemas) A man born and raised in an isolated fallout shelter by parents stuck in the 50's ventures out into crazy, 90's California to find a wife. It's at once a ridiculous and interesting idea for a movie. But the film, despite the affecting performace of Brendan Fraser, is not brave enough to use its available strangeness to support much more than an ordinary boy-meets-girl-with-complications romantic comedy. C- (Rob Roensch)

ED TV (dir Ron Howard, with Matthew McConaughey, Jenna Elfman, playing at Mountain Farms). If you saw the commercial for Ed TV and wondered why they were making a sequel to The Truman Show, you are not alone. But Ed TV aims much lower and straight-forward than Truman, and therefore, is more funny and amusing to watch. McConaughey finally gets comfortable in the lead role and delicious cameos come from Ellen DeGeneres and Martin Landau. But ultimately, it is director Ron Howard who makes Ed TV succeed — while the former child star may not have much to say, he can certainly hold your attention saying it. B- (R.R)

LIFE IS BEAUTIFUL (dir Roberto Benigni, with Roberto Benigni, playing at Pleasant St.) There is no one happier or more energetic than Roberto Benigni, especially after winning two Oscars. Here's a chance to see the film he won for — a highly unusual, gorgeously filmed, hilarious, tragic two hours of entertainment and thought. Benigni basically plays himself, but he's much funnier when he speaks his native Italian, combining the influence of Chaplin and his own unique style, which culminates in facing the Holocaust. The concentration camp scenes are a bit amateurish, and Benigni can get on your nerves sometimes, but the overall effect is superb and devastating. A (Bryan McAllister)

THE MATRIX (dir the Wachowski brothers, with Keanu Reeves, Laurence Fishburne, playing at Mountain Farms). Keanu Reeves has an uncanny knack for starring in action films which end up dramatically affecting the genre. Such is the case with The Matrix, a sci-fi, technology age, special effects explosion that can hardly be defined. Surrounding the amazing effects is an interesting if incomprehensible story and surprisingly well-rounded performances by Reeves and Fishburne. Even if The Matrix can't be fully deciphered, it's something you should see, just to blow your mind. B (A.M.)

MESSAGE IN A BOTTLE (dir Luis Mandoki, with Kevin Costner, Robin Wright Penn, playing at Springfield Cinemas) Mark Message in a Bottle "Return to sender" The Kevin Costner film has a chance to be a poetic and creative romance, but instead resorts to humdrum formulas and tired melodrama. Inept acting and hopelessly slow direction mar it further. D (A.M.)

SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE (dir John Madden, with Joseph Fiennes, Gwyneth Paltrow, playing at Academy of Music) Art and life have had a chaotic history, alternatively frustrating and inspiring each other. In Shakespeare in Love, the Bard (Joseph Fiennes) is suffering writer's block at the dawn of the first performance of the yet-unwritten Romeo and Juliet, until he finds his muse in Paltrow. Wit, enchantment, high comedy and passion follows. A marvelous supporting cast, led by Judi Dench and Geoffrey Rush, and an impeccable script, co-written by noted playwright Tom Stoppard. A (B.M.)

Capturing innocence on Tree

By Matthew Nixon
Collegian Staff

LOOPER
Up A Tree
Sub Pop

Several words on a sticker affixed to the shrink wrap protecting the jewel box say it all. Forget the photograph of a young woman with a hoola hoop on the cover. The words "Belle & Sebastian" in blue ink on the round sticker act like a signal for indie music fans to check this one out.

Looper is the band formed by B&S bassist Stuart David in his spare time. B&S are a rather shy collective of Scottish musicians who fancy folky-pop melodies and reminisce about childhood innocence. Their two U.S. releases (If You're Feeling Sinister, and The Boy With The Arab Strap) rocketed up critics' favorite lists in the past years, while intimate live performances have given them near god-like status in certain circles.

Up A Tree is almost flawless. David sticks with the ideas that have worked so well for B&S, while expanding in very pleasing ways. The innocence one generally associates with childhood is the general theme. Childhood activities such as climbing trees, telling exaggerated stories and defending treehouses appear repeatedly over the course of the album. There are sounds of little kids talking about climbing up a ladder to a treehouse over a friendly beat track and the sounds of a scratchy record to get things started.

"Impossible Thing #2" features the spoken word talents of David. It sounds like fellow Scots Arab Strap, but is many times sweeter. David sounds like Ewan McGregor's Renton from Trainspotting. It is an amusing tale of letter writing. Guitar and scratching give the piece an upbeat feel.

"Festival '95" features David telling another story, this time about getting into a concert for free. As the tracks progress, the stories keep getting better. "Dave The Moon Man" is all about one drunkard's theory about the first moon landing. "Columbo's Car" is about the detective and a Gameboy. Not to spoil the story but Columbo wonders whether the gadget can be used for sampling sounds! It starts out jazzy before veering into Dub Narcotic Sound System territory.

David sings on three of the tracks. "Burning Flies" has some great Hammond organ and is about the joys of time alone and simple things, although a little twisted. "Quiet and Small" sounds like filler and lacks any of the inventiveness present on the other tracks. The title track involves a line about bringing a knife to carve names into a tree and has a whimsical feel. "Ballad Of Ray Suzuki" stands out as a result of its feel good, big beat sound. It features a wacky sample: "You're a bunch of loopers."

The closing track features the mournful sounds of a piano and a sample of a little boy repeating "bye-bye" in a Teletubbies sort of way. A

Harrison in full control and Free

The full, soft-spoken aspects of the alto saxophone have been mastered by an artist named Donald Harrison. Free to Be — his latest release on Impulse — displays his mastery in a big way.

Harrison comes off as a focused, confident musician who is completely comfortable with the unpredictable and "fated" aspects of making music. In no way is he a musician who is preoccupied with musical facts and formulas, and the uncompromised nature of his soloing proves that. Harrison is an organic, earthy musician whose soul is in the sound of an acoustic ensemble.

As a horn player, he is understated and straight-forward and always aware of his presence in the ensemble and in the tunes themselves.

Except for one track on soprano saxophone, Harrison sticks to alto and it is refreshing to hear a contemporary musician who does not feel his sound is "too big" to be kept to only one horn. Harrison does not attempt to display his approach to different horns, rather he stays committed to his own voice through the alto saxophone. This commitment to his instrument allows for a uniform interpretation of the different types of music explored on the record, and really grounds the material.

The record is assembled masterfully, and few times have the liner notes of an album given so much insight for the listener's understanding of the music. In the notes, Harrison describes his creative process and how he chooses tunes for an album; often he hears in the tune a specific sound that can only be the mark of a specific player. For this reason the album is played out by a rotating cast of musicians, each of whom has a specific role in their particular composition.

This is truly the mark of a great jazzman — Harrison is an artist whose playing, writing, and ensemble leading are all directly influenced by his environment and the available resources at any given time.

The wide range of music explored in the tunes of this album reflect the melting pot of influences Harrison has absorbed in his life. This is heard in the way the various rhythm sections assemble themselves to form dense grooves, and layer a number of different influences in the accompaniment of a single tune.

"Indian Blues" is an example of such a tune. The choppy, sprawling rhythm pattern established by piano and drums is set under a riff-based, contrapuntal melody by alto and tenor saxophones. The momentum of the tune is kept by the drummer as the tune's quirky, tension-filled chord progression is held by a sporadic piano and bass, leaving much room for the soloists to stretch out.

The direction of the record evolves as tunes containing different musicians progress. It is obvious the function certain musicians play, as the line-up and material change about half way through the album from straight ahead tunes to smooth, funky grooves. "Mr. Cool Breeze" is a highlight that marks the album's transition to groovier tunes, and which features guitarist Rodney Jones. The solo voices of Jones and Harrison perfectly relate, and could almost have come from the same musical mind.

The first appearance of trumpeter Brian Lynch is a strikingly beautiful ballad entitled "Again, Never," written by filmmaker Spike Lee's father, Bill Lee. The contrast between alto and trumpet is beautiful and the arrangement of the melody is genius. The tone of each horn perfectly complement each other, and the unison and counterpoint lines of the two horns sends a chill up one's spine. There is no doubt about it that Harrison understands this music on a very spiritual level and arranges his music accordingly.

Ben Folds Five to play AC Saturday

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

The wacky Little Richard–style piano rock of Ben Folds Five will be coming to Amherst College's LaFrak gymnasium Saturday night.

The Chapel Hill trio is arguably one of the best live bands around. Lead singer and namesake Ben Folds jumps on his piano, shakes his hips and completely charms the audience with silly antics and stories. Darren Jessee drums up a storm like a little kid gleefully banging pots and pans in his mom's kitchen, and bassist Robert Sledge awards the girls with his endearing smile.

Saturday's show is the second stop of a tour in support of their upcoming (April 27) release, The Unauthorized Biography of Reinhold Messner. The album features "Magic", a full–band production version of "The Magic that Holds the Sky Up From the Ground", a song originally written and recorded as a solo track by Jessee, included on a benefit album, The Garden Place: Songs By Our Friends. It also includes "Your Most Valuable Possession", a track which Ben's dad, Dean, collaborated on, and "Army", their most recent radio single.

With any luck, the band will mix old and new, and perform their chart–topper "Underground," dance favorites "Julianne" and "Song For The Dumped," heavy–metal spoof "The Ultimate Sacrifice," and ballad beauties "Philosophy" and "Brick." There's really no telling with Ben and the boys, but the show is sure to be a memorable one.

Opening act Fleming and John is a worthwhile show in itself. The band just released an impressive album on Universal Records, The Way We Are. It's a blend of screeching guitar rock and melodic pop. The band is a wife–and–husband team of Fleming McWilliams and John Mark Painter.

McWilliams has an amazing voice that at times sounds remarkably like the Cardigans, and at rare moments like Bjork and Shakespeare's Sister. Or, as their band biography modestly states: "A Hindu love goddess, an earnest Girl Scout, a screaming heavy metal empress, an operatic Disney fairy, a salacious soul queen — all of these somehow miraculously co–exist within Fleming's vocal cords." Oh yeah, they're pretty good with words, too.

Painter dabbles with all sorts of traditional and not–so– traditional instruments — guitar, bass, percussion, cello, trombone, bongo, lap steel, xylophone, dilruba, spacephone, bodhran, dulcimer, clarinet, theremin, timpani, chimes, flugelhorn, balalaika, vibes, oud, saz, buhl buhl, harmonium, porta chord and tabla.

Oud? Saz? I don't know either, but they sound fun and are sure to make for an interesting show. There's also something called The Love Sponge Strings and a sample track of a young child singing "Twinkle (Twinkle Little Star)."

"Comfortable" is wonderful, as is "Rain All Day." "Sadder Day" is a happy, dancey Cardigans–esque disco number. And Ben Folds fans will especially enjoy the catchy pop of "Ugly Girl," which Mr. Benjamin Scott Folds actually helped write. Painter, in turn, did strings and played horns on BFF's Reinhold Messner. Saturday's show may include a little collaborating as well, which would be quite the treat.

The show is taking place at LaFrak Auditorium, Amherst College. Doors open at 8 p.m. Tickets are $20 and are available at For the Record in Amherst or by calling 256–6154.

include the "Island Hopper Chicken" which is an 8 oz. tenderloin charbroiled and topped with a delicious shrimp and corn salsa. The Rainforest Cafe also has a variety of sandwiches with excellent french fries, and thinly cut fried onions that are wonderful.

The only downsides to the Rainforest Cafe are the price and the wait. The closest Rainforest Cafe to Amherst is in Burlington, Mass., and if you do not make a reservation, expect to wait a long time. Also bring a lot of cash, because the food isn't cheap.

2.) The Cheesecake Factory

This is another highly priced, very popular restaurant, but it is one of the few that does not go overboard hawking its merchandise. The chain, which originated in California, boasts the best cheesecake in the world, and the cheesecake is not the best food that you can get there. The Cheesecake Factory has everything from burgers and pizza to an incredible chicken marsala dish. However, the cheesecake is by far the star of the show. With over 35 different varieties of the rich delicacy, there is clearly a reason to leave room for dessert.

3.) Outback Steakhouse

The Outback is just starting to get into a memorabilia market, selling the same type of things as other theme restaurants such as T-shirts and dolls. The big difference between Outback and other places, however, is the price. The food is not cheap, but it's a lot cheaper. What's ironic about this Steakhouse is that the steak is not their best meal. Try the chicken or the fish, you will be pleasantly surprised.

The Worst:

1.) All Star Sports Cafe

This chain is partly owned by nationally famous sports figures such as Shaquille O'Neal, Ken Griffey Jr. and Andre Agassi. If you ever wondered where the 120 million dollars that Shaq earns comes from, I'm pretty sure it originates in lousy chicken sandwiches. The one time I went to The All Star Sports Cafe, I had a subpar, small, buffalo chicken sandwich and a soda, and I think it cost me about 25 dollars. I think the reason that the sandwich was so expensive was because the restaurant claimed that it was Shaq's favorite meal. I felt so privileged that I was allowed to eat the favorite item on the menu from a sports star who I absolutely despise.

2.) Planet Hollywood

When Planet Hollywood came on the scene a few years ago, it seemed like it would be the next Hard Rock Cafe. What it actually became is an overpriced and pretty dull display of Hollywood collector's items. It depends which Planet Hollywood you visit (the one I went to was the biggest in the country in Disney World) because the memorabilia changes. What doesn't change is the expensive, low quality food. Planet Hollywood does, however, get points for creative dishes. They have quite a selection of vegetarian meals, as well as their trademarked "Capt. Crunch Chicken."

3.) Roger Clemens' Wood Roasted Chicken

No, you're not reading the April Fools addition, and yes, it actually existed. I'm pretty sure that all of the Rhode Island based restaurants have since closed down, but for some reason, the Rocket decided to open a chain of "wood roasted chicken" restaurants — that were actually fast food, like Boston Market. The chicken was absolutely horrible, and I'm pretty sure the only memorabilia that I saw while I was there was a signed baseball from Wade Boggs (They probably didn't even make enough money to pay Ruger to sign a ball). The idea was obviously short lived, and it gives me one more reason to say "Yankee fans, you can have him."

There are so many different places to eat, shop and just plain have fun. The theme restaurant seems to combine all of these things into one big ball of family enjoyment.

found the Chili's experience extremely enjoyable. Each time I visited Chili's I found the food and service far beyond my expectations. I would definitely suggest have to suggest ordering from Chili's grilled items as well as from their Tex-Mex dishes. Chili's dinner entrees are moderately priced between $5.50 and $13.95, and are definitely worth the price. A-

3) Bertucci's

I've eaten once at Bertucci's in the past year, and the only reason was because my girlfriend was a waitress there. Of course I felt the service was good, but I was pleasantly surprised with the ambiance and menu decisions. I found many of the menu items quite enticing and would suggest Bertucci's to anyone who is looking for good, authentic Italian cuisine on a budget. B

4) The Olive Garden

Along with Bertucci's, The Olive Garden serves up authentic Italian cuisine on a budget. The service and ambiance were very appealing to go along with the dining which was both flavorful and filling. In the past I have been extremely satisfied with my experiences at The Olive Garden and would definitely suggest it to anyone. The entrees are priced between $6.50 and $13.95 and are well worth it. B+

5) Joe's American Bar and Grill

Joe's American Bar and Grill puts forth a classic dining experience. The bistro atmosphere with the wait staff's garb and open hearth is very appetizing and should appeal to both young and old. The menu consists of mainly grilled and sauteed items, which are priced slightly higher than other concept restaurant competitors ($7.00 to $21.95). I found the food very palatable and appetizing, and along with the atmosphere it made for a pleasurable dining experience. The only setback on Joe's is its prices. B+

6) The Pub

An Amherst institution, the Pub provides an extremely comfortable setting with its very friendly and attractive wait staff. The Pub also provides a variety of menu items from burgers to Tex-Mex to steaks. The Pub's menu is priced modestly and has the same as many other concept Restaurants ($5.50-$13.95). I suggest that if you haven't been to the Pub yet, to make it a plan to go before you graduate. A

7) Chi-Chi's

Now the fun begins. I was forced to go to Chi-Chi's by some friends of mine; forced because I thought of Chi-Chi's as a sub-par restaurant; needless to say my preconception was true. The only positive aspect of Chi-Chi's was the ambiance; it was very Southwest. Aside from that, the dining experience was horrible. I found the wait staff to be very rude and badly trained and the cuisine (if that word fits) was atrocious. I also felt the menu was poorly priced for a Tex-Mex eatery ($5.50-$13.95). The only way I would ever suggest this restaurant to a person is if the asked me where the could get some over priced, poorly prepared Tex- Mex food, with a side of obnoxious, poor servers. D+

8) Applebee's

I know what you are all thinking: he can't say something bad about Applebee's, I see it packed every night. Well, you're wrong. I find Applebee's to be the worst offender of many concept restaurant don'ts. First I found the ambiance to be very poor, I felt cramped and extremely uncomfortable. The next problem was the wait staff. Where do I start? It took my parts 10 minutes to get seated, which wasn't bad in any respect, but then it took our waitress at least another 10 minutes to greet us at the table, and then another 10 minutes to get our beverages. The really put me off. Eventually, 45 minutes after we sat down, we received our entrees — but Applebee's wasn't out of the woods yet. In cutting into my steak, I came to find that it was well done, even though I ordered it medium rare. Another member of my party had the same problem, which yet another questioned the freshness of his grilled chicken breast. Finally, after an hour and fifteen minutes of waiting, our meals were re-served in what was an almost satisfactory manner. After our meal, almost two hours after we originally sat down, we were done. The thing that irked me most of all was that on the way out of the restaurant, the hostess asked us if everything was satisfactory and invited us back again; the hostess was lucky my girlfriend was there to hold me back from giving her a piece of my mind, though she told me I should have after she spent the following three hours vomiting up her dinner. I wouldn't suggest Applebee's to anybody, not even my worst enemy, but hey, it's your life, you decide. F-

New shows offer a mixed bag of fun

Re-runs! Re-runs! Re-runs! Is there any way to describe how sick I am of watching the same old junk that's been aired at least once before?

The bottom line is that the networks are gearing up for their big season finales, while at the same time, leaving viewers out in the dark with nothing to watch. The whole theory of "If you haven't seen it, it's new to you" just does not work for me, and I'm sure it doesn't appeal to millions of avid fans waiting to see what's going to happen next on their favorite shows. Personally, I can't wait for more insane action on "Party of Five", I'm suffering from "Dawson's Creek" withdrawal symptoms, and it's vital that NBC sends Ross, Rachel, Joey, Phoebe, Chandler and Monica my way, for the simple fact that I have no "Friends" of my own.

Since I refuse to watch old episodes of things I've already seen before, I've resorted to looking forward to new series that are being shoved into the networks' line-up for the next year. Over the past few weeks, I've had a chance to watch and review the new stuff that's trying to be a supplement for the normal television that I depend on worse than a bad cocaine habit.

The two new cartoons on FOX have established a nice following based solely on the fact that they were aired right after "The Simpsons." "Futurama" was the first to be released, and has received mixed reviews. The show takes a look at life in the 31st century, and stars Fry, a teenager who was cryogenically frozen in 1999, and now must face the reality that he is alone in a strange new world. In his search for long lost relatives, Fry finds that his distant nephew, Professor Farnsworth, is the only surviving member of his family.

Upon his arrival into New York City, Fry befriends Bender, a wise cracking robot who's job it is to "bend stuff," and Leela, a one-eyed alien freak with the voice of Katie Segal (Peg Bundy, for all you "Married With Children" fans).

"Futurama" tries extremely hard to use the same comedy aspects as "The Simpsons" while being original at the same time. The show is very funny at times, and the concepts really work well. It tends to stay true to its cartoon routes by not being very realistic, while it also tries to take very real themes such as lonelliness, hard work and friendship to create a sense of reality.

"Futurama" really works well, and can now be seen as part of FOX's "all new animated Tuesday." Unfortunately, "Futurama" is the only quality show in this line-up which includes the dying "King of the Hill" and the absolutely horrendous "The PJ's." "Futurama" is definitely worth the watch, and gets a grade of: B+

If you haven't been introduced to Peter, Lois, Chris, Meg, Stewie and Brian Griffin yet, I command you to tune into "Family Guy" this Sunday at 8:30 p.m. The only way to define this show, is absolutely outrageous. It is still questionable who the star of the show is, since most of them are absolutely crazy. Peter is a husband and father, who first had gas was when he was thirty years old. Peter's wife, Lois, is a piano teacher who looks after her insane children during the day. The two eldest children, Chris and Meg, are brain-dead high school students whose life-long ambitions are to grow up and be popular, without ever knowing where babies come from. The youngest child, Stewie, is a baby with the IQ of an Harvard graduate, who is obsessed with killing his mother. Finally, Brian is the family dog, who is the voice of reason for the entire family (and this isn't a surprise, because all animals can speak on this show).

"Family Guy" is highlighted by wacky situations such as newscasters talking dirty to each other, and frequent visits from celebrities such as the Kellogg's Raisin Bran sun and the Kool-aid guy. One of the writers of the show, David Zuckerman, created all of the Naked Gun films, so you know that "Family Guy" must be extremely crazy. "Family Guy" airs Sundays after "The Simpsons," and definitely deserves its grade of: A+

Another new series that entered the TV world a few weeks ago is "It's Like, You Know..." on ABC. The big talk about this series is that Jennifer Grey, who was seen before in Ferris Bueller's Day Off and Dirty Dancing, has gotten a nose job, and plays an actress who used to be huge, but now has found work on a new TV-sitcom. The series is getting some positive reviews, but its lack of substance makes it pretty bad. The grade? C

After insulting everybody and their brother, you wouldn't think that Norm MacDonald would be back on television. Well take another guess, because the witty, offensive Norm is back with his new sitcom "The Norm Show." Norm plays a rehabilitation criminal who is working in a community service building. The show absolutely thrives on MacDonald's humor, because the writing is not very good. It seems like Norm's entire role is done add-lib, and it often creates confusion around the cast. Norm's not a very good actor, but he's extremely funny. Unfortunately, his humor will not work on "The Norm Show," and it will be cancelled in due time. However, it wasn't canceled before it could receive it's grade of C+.

Finally, Craig Kilborn is back on the air as host of "The Late Late Show." CBS needed someone to come along and challenge the huge ratings that are gained by Conan O'Brien every night on NBC, and Tom Snyder was simply not doing the job. Kilborn brings with him the same humor that worked so well at "The Daily Show," but it seems like he has trouble keeping it up for more than a half an hour. His patent "Five Questions" is by far the best part of the new series, and will certainly be the driving force behind the new talk show. If Kilborn can adjust to the length of time he's on the air, and constantly be funny, the show will be a success. The new "Late Late Show" host can take a B home to his mommy, and put it on the refrigerator.

There are a few new series to watch, but like most of you, I miss the old stuff. Or should I say, I miss the old stuff, I miss the old stuff, I miss the old stuff. Repetition sucks, doesn't it?

Black and Silver.

The Raiders will also be looking to add depth at the quarterback position by possibly acquiring McNown or Germaine. They will likely get Germaine, due to the fact that McNown will probably go in the pick before theirs, but if that is the case, then they most likely will be able to wait for the second or third round to select a QB.

Also on their wish list is a running back in the later rounds and they will need to hope that this late rounder develops into a star.

• The New York Giants are looking to regain the form they had in 1997 when they won the division and returned to the playoffs after a long hiatus from the post season. However, the Giants have to face the fact that that season was a fluke and they weren't as good as their record indicated. Remember they play in the NFC (U.Least).

They will be looking for a running back. Knowing they will not get one of the quality backs they will have to face the fact that they will likely end up with Amos Zereoue (West Virginia), who will be a much more solid back than Gary Brown ever was, and will likely be more consistent than the former San Diego and Houston back.

The Giants will use their remaining eight picks to fill huge holes up the air as host of "The Late Late Show." CBS needed someone to come along and challenge the huge ratings that are gained by Conan O'Brien every night on NBC, and Tom Snyder was simply not doing the job. Kilborn brings with him the same humor that worked so well at "The Daily Show," but it seems like he has trouble keeping it up for more than a half an hour. • The Cowboys head into the draft in a state of flux. They don't know exactly what they are going to need. After all most of it depends on whether or not they get the players they need in the free agent market, which puts them in the position of taking the best player available.

These players include David Boston (Ohio State) or Troy Edwards (Louisiana Tech) at the wide receiver position, Anthony McFarland (Louisiana State) at tackle, Al Wilson (Tennessee) at linebacker or Kearse or Ekuban at defensive end.

• The Buffalo Bills will be selecting 23rd and will be focusing on two positions in this draft, one is corner where they will likely try and acquire two, and at wide-out where they will also try to acquire a pair.

The Bills feel they have solid starters at every position but Wade Phillips also said that he would concentrate on defense in the first round. Expect the team to select either Antoine Winfield (Ohio State) or Fernando Bryant (Alabama) at the corner position with their first pick.

At wideout if the Bills wait for the middle rounds they will likely get Tai Streets (Michigan) or Na Brown (North Carolina). Neither of these receivers would be impact additions but they would add depth to the squad.

They also hold tight end Rufus French (Mississippi) in high regard and would like to acquire him to add some depth at TE.

• Buffalo's division foe, the Miami Dolphins, holds the 24th pick in the first round and will be looking to add to the list of good drafts for Jimmy Johnson. As usual, a Johnson led team is solid on defense but needs to add to the offense. They will need to address the concerns at wide receiver for Dan Marino, as well as get a running back to avoid the runner-by-committee system of last year.

They love Edgerrin James (Miami) and would covet his arrival but divisional foe New England could have something to say about that, picking 20th. The Dolphins might be forced to take a gamble on Cecil Collins (Louisana State).

At receiver, the Dolphins are on a long list of people who are looking to acquire solid wideouts. Their interest currently lies with Torry Holt (North Carolina State) and Edwards, but in the long run the Fish will likely be drafting Peerless Price (Tennessee).

Expect the Phins to take a young QB before it's all over, as well as a guy from Kansas State (Michael Bishop).

• The Green Bay Packers, a great team only two years ago, but free agency and age killed them. Now Ray Rhodes gets set to finish off the Packers in Title Town — just wait until he benches Brett Favre.

The Pack have 12 picks and are looking to fill all their needs and could have been right back in contention if not for Rhodes' arrival. The Pack may look to possibly get safety Antwuan Edwards (Clemson), because they could move free safety Darren Sharper to corner.

The Pack will also need to find a solid replacement for Reggie White. They, too, are looking at King and Ebukan as possible players to fill that role. For the Packers at that position, much will depend on how the Draft plays out.

• The Jacksonville Jaguars are a team on the verge of greatness, they just need to fill some gaping holes.

Starting with corner. The team that was lit up by the Vikes receivers last year for over 40 points needs help at the position.

Like Bills, they are looking for Winfield or Bryant at the position and will likely get the Bills leftovers unless they move up.

The Jags also have a concern at end, where they want one of the solid top five ends, but will likely be robbed of that opportunity, seeing as how everyone in front of them wants many of the same players.

If they decide to go DE in the second or third rounds, they could find themselves with any one of these players including Mike Rucker (Nebraska), Tom Burke (Wisconsin) or maybe Roosevelt Colvin (Purdue).

The Jags might also be looking to take a gamble on a linebacker in the second round, and the steal they might find there, is Andy Katzenmoyer (Onio St.), who will likely fall despite what the experts say.

• The San Francisco 49ers have some work to do. They have seven picks and will likely have to spend most of them working on all four position on the defensive line and corner, possibly even using a couple at offensive tackle.

The 49ers are big on several players that will likely be available when they draft. At tackle they might go with McFarland, or they might take Lamar King at DE to be Charles Haley's backup, whom they will likely need. With the second pick, the Niners are expected to go corner due to their youth at the position, but probably will not get the stars and will have to settle for Fred Vinson (Vanderbilt).

• One other team stands out that doesn't have a pick until 57th in this year's draft, and that is the New York Jets. They lost their first round pick in the draft for Bill Parcells three years ago and saw others go in trades during drafts by the same head coach.

Like Dirka Parcells' total control of the lets will likely hurt them before it helps them in terms of personnel moves. Granted, both guys are good coaches, but total control for these two egomaniacs could result in problems for these franchises.

The Jets will need to address issues they have at the guard position, where they need two players. They also need someone at the end position on defense.

The Jets will likely select a guard to help the running game in the second round and they have numerous players to choose from including Randy Thomas (Mississippi State) and Brandon Bullsworth (Arkansas).

The Jets would like to acquire both players if possible, but due to their bad draft positioning they are unlikely to get them. The Jets also might take a tackle if any of the good ones slip as far down as 57.

The Jets are also looking to improve their corner situation by maybe finding someone to play where Otis Smith currently roams. One of the names tossed around includes Charles Fisher (West Virginia), but due to their need on the O-line and their lack of high picks, expect more of an Andre Weathers from Michigan.

In other notes, The Sporting News and USA Today's pre- draft publications listed UMass Division I-AA All-American linebacker Khari Samuel in the low teens on the depth chart for insider linebackers who will likely be selected in the Draft.

Now you're set to sit down for 48 hours this weekend and see how the greatest draft in professional sports plays out and the impact that it will have over the next NFL season.

"Together" on it... The first year, I put all the numbers of everybody on the team around it, and the second year, some of the numbers changed so I did that again."

The midfielder has not stopped there. In a world that embraces the individual athlete, Minaker has refused to cross the finish line without the other Minutewomen beside her.

Her most recent team project has drawn an ironic parallel to the squad's development — and, unintentionally, her invaluable role in that development.

"This year, I made a puzzle for everybody," Minaker said. "It's posterboard size and there are 24 different pieces, because there are about 24 people on our team. I made this puzzle and it says 'team' in the middle of it and I put magazine clips and everybody's names around the border of it. I gave everybody a piece or two and we all put it together — and now it's in our locker room. I glued it up so it's not in pieces anymore."

Browns sitting pretty for the draft

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Cleveland Browns might be a new franchise, but they know how to play the draft game: When in doubt, peddle disinformation.

So while they say they've narrowed their choice with the No. 1 pick in Saturday's draft to Tim Couch and Akili Smith and running back Ricky Williams, they won't tip their hand.

Let's tip it for them (no guarantees, no money back):

1. They won't take Williams, because the shelf life of a good NFL running back isn't as long as they'll need to get to the Super Bowl.

2. They probably won't trade the pick unless they get something like all of New Orleans' No. 1 picks for the next decade.

3. Ty Detmer, one of many ex-49ers on Carmen Policy and Dwight Clark's roster, is an adequate QB for a team without Super Bowl aspirations and the kind of guy who can help bring along a youngster.

Smith or Couch?

Chris Palmer, the Browns' coach, has been saying nice things about Smith and not so nice things about Couch, and Policy is tight with Smith's agent, Leigh Steinberg.

Drafters and draftees feed on disinformation.

TIM COUCH, QB, Kentucky.

2. PHILADELPHIA — The Eagles need everything. But it starts at quarterback with DONOVAN McNABB, QB, Syracuse. Given the Philly phans and talk shows, he'd better outperform Smith.

3. CINCINNATI — Mike Brown wants a quarterback, although the Bengals need a lot. Brown, who's made a lot of bad ones, makes the call...

AKILI SMITH, QB, Oregon.

4. INDIANAPOLIS — As he was in Carolina four years ago, Bill Polian is a key to the first round. He can pick Ricky Williams or Chris Claiborne, trade the pick, trade Marshall Faulk, or take...

CHAMP BAILEY, CB-WR, Georgia

5. WASHINGTON — Ricky's still here?

RICKY WILLIAMS, RB, Texas.

6. ST. LOUIS — The Rams took Lawrence Phillips here three years ago. Does that bode well for EDGERRIN JAMES, RB, Miami?

7. CHICAGO — The Bears haven't had a Pro Bowler since 1994. IRVON KEARSE, DE-LB, Florida, can change that.

8. ARIZONA — They need an offensive line, but the Cardinals have a second first-rounder. TORRY HOLT, WR, North Carolina State, is a steal this low.

9. DETROIT — The Lions need an offensive tackle and defense and both are here. When in doubt, go defense... CHRIS CLAIBORNE, LB, Southern California.

10. BALTIMORE — A quarterback fits. But CHRIS McALISTER, CB, Arizona, is the last building block in what could be one of the NFL's best defenses.

11. MINNESOTA — The Vikings covet McAlister. They "settle" for DAUNTE CULPEPPER, QB, Central Florida, because who knows how long Randall Cunningham will last and who really wants Jeff George?

12. NEW ORLEANS — Mike Ditka says he'll trade his entire draft for Williams. But he's stuck with Billy Joes at quarterback. So he takes CADE McNOWN, QB, UCLA, a winner like a guy named McMahon whom Ditka once coached.

13. PITTSBURGH — Signing Wayne Gandy was supposed to stabilize the offensive line. Then Justin Strzelczyk was hurt, so they need JOHN TAIT, OT, Brigham Young.

14. KANSAS CITY — Here go the big guys. L.T. SHELTON, OT, Eastern Michigan, whose father played in the NBA.

15. TAMPA BAY — The road grader, AARON GIBSON, OT, Wisconsin, who moved up when he weighed in at a svelte 376.

16. TENNESSEE — The Titans prefer an outside pass rusher. But they can't pass on ANTHONY McFARLAND, DT, LSU.

17. SEATTLE — Mike Holmgren's first pick in his dual role: DAVID BOSTON, WR, Ohio State.

18. OAKLAND — There are a lot of golf courses in the Bay Area for someone who got college credit for playing golf, ANDY KATZENMOYER, LB, Ohio State.

19. NEW YORK GIANTS — No Gibson, Shelton or Tait. They either trade or take EBENEZER EKUBAN, DE, North Carolina.

20. NEW ENGLAND — They can't get up high enough for Williams or James. So they'll get an RB later and take DAMIEN WOODY, C, Boston College.

21. ARIZONA — The Cardinals could have had Tait. They opt for MATT STINCHCOMB, OT, Georgia.

22. DALLAS — Jerry Jones grabs LAMAR KING, DE-Saginaw Valley State, who has been moving up quickly.

23. BUFFALO — The Bills do well in the 20s. That means a third first-round Buckeye. CB ANTOINE WINFIELD, a little guy who can cover.

24. MIAMI — Jimmy Johnson got a lot from a Syracuse fullback nicknamed "Moose." ROB KONRAD, FB, Syracuse, can run better.

25. GREEN BAY — A lot of needs for a team a year removed from its second straight Super Bowl. TROY EDWARDS, WR, Louisiana Tech, for Brett Favre's arsenal.

26. JACKSONVILLE — DE-fence, DE-fence, PATRICK KERNEY, DE, Virgina.

27. SAN FRANCISCO — If only someone had said "Jake Plummer" instead of "Jim Druckenmiller" two years ago. Might trade down for him or take SHAUN KING, QB, Tulane — a right-handed Steve Young? — with this pick.

28. NEW ENGLAND — They want JAMES JOHNSON, RB, Missippi State. They can get him here or lower.

29. MINNESOTA — They get lucky with FERNANDO BRYANT, CB, Alabama.

30. ATLANTA — Despite its Super Bowl trip, this is NOT the team that has everything. KEVIN JOHNSON, WR, Syracuse.

31. DENVER — A new right tackle, JON JANSEN, OT, Michigan, to replace Harry Swayne, who left for Baltimore.

The Great One may call its quits; Gretzky could retire after this year

Hockey is on the verge of losing its greatest player.

After setting virtually every scoring record, Wayne Gretzky seems to be ready to call it a career.

Gretzky has invited his family to come to New York on Sunday for the New York Rangers' regular-season finale against Pittsburgh, an end to a second straight non-playoff season for the Blueshirts. While there has been speculation and reports over the past two days concerning the Great One's future, Walter Gretzky said his son's mind was made up.

"I would strongly suspect that Sunday will be his final game," the elder Gretzky told radio station CKGL in Kitchener, Ontario. "I haven't talked to him personally. He's talked with his mom, but most likely he will announce a retirement."

He said he asked his son last summer when he would retire, and he replied, "The day that I stop enjoying it is the day I'm finished."

The Rangers were reportedly set to make a big push yesterday to convince Gretzky against retirement. Coach John Muckler and general manager Neil Smith were to meet with Gretzky and plead with him to remain with the team, the New York Daily News reported yesterday.

Should he then still decide to retire — as has been speculated — the Rangers would hold a news conference on Saturday to make the announcement official and allow fans to give him a proper sendoff the next day, the newspaper said.

Mark Messier, who won four Stanley Cups with Gretzky while playing for Edmonton in the 1980s, reserved judgment.

"Everyone else is insinuating that he's retiring — but everybody except the most important person, and that's himself. So we'll just wait and see the way things turn out and what Wayne himself has to say," Messier said.

Speaking Tuesday via satellite from New York to a conference on the state of hockey in Canada, Gretzky reminisced about the sport and sounded much like a 38-year-old man ready to hang up his skates.

"Hockey has been a part of my life as long as I can remember," he said. "I lived it and I breathed it as a kid and as an adult. It's the only job I've ever had."

He took no questions.

If this is the end, Gretzky will leave with statistics and awards that are staggering by any standard.

He had 894 goals and 1,961 assists in 1,483 regular season games, including nine goals and 51 assists in 66 games with the Rangers this season. In the playoffs, the Great One had 122 goals and 260 assists in 208 games.

For his career, he was a nine-time winner of the Hart Trophy as league's most valuable player ('1980, '81, '82, '83, '84, '85, '86, '87, '89); 10 times the league's leading scorer ('1981, '82, '83, '84, '85, '86, '87, '90, '91, '94); a four-time Lady Byng winner as the most gentlemanly player ('1980, '91, '92, '94); a five-time winner of the Lester Pearson award as NHL's outstanding player ('1982, '83, '84, '85, '87), and twice (the winner of the Conn Smythe Trophy as the most valuable player in the playoffs ('1985, '88).

This hasn't been a typical season for Gretzky, who missed 11 games with a neck injury. He had played in 223 straight games since signing with the Rangers as a free agent in 1996.

The injury was the second in Gretzky's career involving a disc. In 1992-93, he missed most of the season with a lower back injury before coming back to lead the Los Angeles Kings to the Stanley Cup finals.

The 1998-99 season has included at least one milestone for the NHL's leading career scorer. His ninth goal of the year gave him 1,072 as a professional, moving him past boyhood hero Gordie Howe.

"Wherever Wayne Gretzky has traveled, that's where hockey is," Rangers color analyst John Davidson said in a telephone interview Tuesday night.

Davidson reiterated that he believes Gretzky is 80 percent sure he will retire after Sunday's game.

After the Rangers' win over Tampa Bay on Monday night, Gretzky admitted he was thinking about retirement but had not made a decision.

"I have 1,000 different thoughts, to be honest," Gretzky said. "It's time to think about it... All of a sudden it's become a bigger issue than I imagined," he said. "Let's see what happens over the next five or six days."

The Rangers intend to pick up the $5 million option on Gretzky's contract this week, Smith said Tuesday.

Smith insisted that Gretzky is an emotional player who has ups and downs, and that missing the playoffs for a second straight year and being sidelined with a neck injury might have made him consider retirement a little more.

"I think he is going to play," Smith said optimistically.

Muckler, a longtime associate, also felt Gretzky would be back next year.

"I have no reason to say that, really. I guess because it would be a sad day if he does elect to retire," Muckler told TSN's That's Hockey. "I think Wayne still has the passion for the game. He still plays the game hard, he likes the people associated with the game. I think he would miss it terribly. And he can still contribute to the game."

Newspapers in Toronto and New York have reported that Gretzky will retire after Sunday's game.

Michael Barnett, Gretzky's agent, did not immediately return a telephone call left at his Riverside, Calif., office by The Associated Press on Tuesday.

The Toronto Sun reported Gretzky would retire, saying the only way he would revise his decision to quit would be if his wife, Janet, and Barnett urged him to step back and review his decision.

The Sun and ESPN quoted unidentified sources as saying Gretzky asked for an unusually large number of tickets for Sunday's game, although the Rangers said that he officially only asked for 10 tickets.

Gretzky responded to questions about Davidson's report by saying, "There's been times where I've said things to friends that get blown way out of proportion.

"The only thing I will say is that I will not be one of those guys who says 'I'm 90 percent sure' or 'Maybe I'm coming back.' The decision I make will be 100 percent. No ifs, ands or buts."

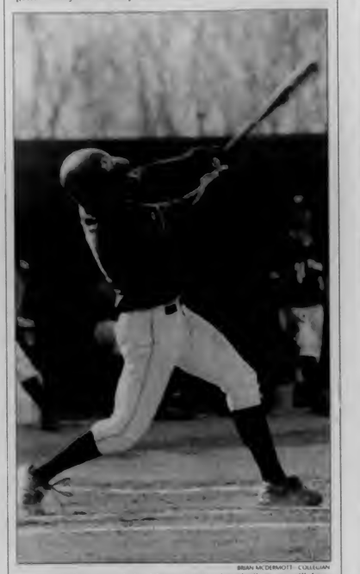
threats at the plate for UMass.



"Our top four hitters are freshman, which is good because that means that we recruited well, but is also bad because it means that our returning players haven't played as well as we hoped," Stone said. "Now we're looking for those guys to continue [their success] and for the rest of the guys to pick it up."

Other Minutemen who have been consistent contributors offensively have been seniors Bryan Mazzaferro, Brian Samela and Aaron Braunstein. Braunstein leads the team in home runs and RBI, while Mazzaferro has been over the .300 mark for practically the entire season. Samela has also gotten timely hits in many clutch situations this year for UMass.

Sophomore first baseman Nate Lang has also started to come around as of late, and also boasts a batting average over .300.

Stone also announced yesterday that he will give the ball to sophomore right-hander Nick Skirkanich today against the Huskies. The Cheshire, Conn. native was roughed up in his last outing against the University of Connecticut last Thursday, but was the victim of seven Massachusetts errors in the contest.

After today's non-conference matchup, the Minutemen will continue their 10-game homestand with another crucial Atlantic 10 series against Temple this weekend.

Past problems may hurt Collins at the NFL draft

By Mary Foster
Associated Press

BATON ROUGE, La. — Cecil Collins is so good at running the football that he could be a first-round draft pick Saturday, although he played in just six college games.

Instinct and a muscle-packed body that seems almost designed for the game make it look easy for him to punch through defenses, sprint downfield and score touchdowns.

He's so good that teams may even be willing to overlook his off-field problems: failed drug tests, two felony convictions and the four years of probation he's currently serving.

"He's got first-round ability," New Orleans Saints director of college scouting Bruce Lemmerman said. "You can't deny his talent."

Nobody denies Collins' ability. What worries them is when he leaves the football field.

Collins played three games for LSU in 1997 that electrified football fans, rushing for 583 yards on 69 carries. But he made just three carries in his fourth game against Vanderbilt before breaking his right leg.

Collins never suited up for the Tigers again.

He was kicked off the team last June 25 after he was arrested and charged with barging into an apartment and fondling a young woman. He was arrested again July 8 on similar charges.

As talented as he was, Collins had trouble finding another college team to play for. McNeese State finally took a chance, but kicked him out Sept. 15 after Collins failed a court-ordered drug test.

Collins spent a month in jail and two months in a halfway house. His college career was over, but maybe not his football career. In a deal worked out with prosecutors, Collins plead guilty to two misdemeanors and two felonies and was given probation, reassuring NFL teams he won't be in jail instead of on the practice field.

But will Collins stay out of trouble from now on? With the memory of Lawrence Phillips, the sixth overall pick in 1996 and a washout as a pro, so fresh, will pro teams gamble on Collins?

"He's an interesting player," said Miami's Jimmy Johnson, one of the coaches reportedly interested in Collins. "He has as much risk as any high-profile guy that has come around in a long time. But if you're picking late in the first round, there's going to be risk with every player."

Johnson was one of the people willing to take a look at Phillips after he flopped with St. Louis. But Phillips didn't stay out of trouble as a Dolphin, either, and was released.

Collins, 5-foot-10, 208 pounds, worked with a personal trainer when he got out of jail in January. At the NFL Combine in Indianapolis, he clocked a 4.41 in the 40-yard dash after only six weeks of training.

Three weeks later, Collins was doing private auditions for a dozen NFL teams.

"I just thank the Lord and the NFL for giving me another chance," said Collins, who said he spent his jail time reading the Bible. "I plan to show everyone what I can do, the kind of athlete I am. I'm going to work hard and do things right."

Collins, with his ready smile and bubbling sense of humor, is a likable person with exceptional talent and a solid work ethic on the field, according to those who know him.

"When he hit the practice field, he had only one speed, and that was full speed," said McNeese running backs coach John Nagle.

Off the field, Collins had long flouted rules.

"He probably always got a little extra leeway," said Danny Smith, Collins' high school coach who used to drive Collins to school every morning. "You have a player like that, you're going to take care of him."

Collins follows in the footsteps of other players with talent and troubles. Randy Moss wasn't taken until the 21st pick of last year's draft because teams couldn't ignore his problems as a teen-ager. He went on to be selected an All-Pro and Offensive Rookie of the Year.

"With Randy Moss, you knew he was a heck of a player," Johnson said. "With Cecil, you've got to be concerned with everything."

Collins has proclaimed himself a changed man. The attorneys who represented him on criminal charges agree.

"Cecil has been drug-tested every week since October and has been clean every time," said Rodney Baum, one of Collins' attorneys. "He's done everything we asked him. He's acknowledged his wrongdoing and he's ready to move on."

In addition to the weekly drug-testing, Collins must remain in counseling and refrain from using drugs and alcohol for the four years he's on probation. Smith said he thought if an older player would take Collins under his wing, it would keep him out of trouble.

Collins is counting on a jail-house conversion and lessons learned from the past year to keep him straight.

"I intend to do the right thing," Collins said after his court date. "I'm glad to have another chance, and I'm going to make the most of it."

Duke another school to lose a top-notch player

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Duke's Mike Krzyzewski has joined the short list of coaches whose star leaves early to join the NBA. It's a sign of the times that instead of asking whether the move is good for the kid any more, most people will ask how Coach K kept the talent drain plugged for so long.

Sophomore Elton Brand, the consensus college basketball player of the year, announced today that he will forgo his last two years of eligibility to try his luck in the pros.

Krzyzewski, who is recovering from hip surgery, was gracious in thanking Brand and sincere in wishing him well.

Under the NBA's new rookie salary scale, the last pick in the first round makes almost $2 million in his first three years and up to $1 million a year in his fourth. Considering the dollars involved, the move is almost always too tempting to pass up.

Attorney Lon Babby's client list argues just the opposite. It includes former Duke stars Grant Hill, Christian Laettner and Cherokee Parks, as well as Tim Duncan, who played four years at Wake Forest.

But the only thing Babby says he's learned is that there is no right answer for everyone.

"For Tim and Grant, it was right to stay in school. Some kids benefit greatly, not just in terms of their game, but what they need to learn about life," Babby said. "The other side is that there are lots of kids who don't want to stay or can't afford to. As long as the decision is based on good information and support from coaches and parents, you respect it."

During Krzyzewski's tenure, Duke's principal rival, North Carolina, has practically become a finishing school for NBA-bound underclassmen.

The Tar Heels lost a jug-eared, senior-to-be named Michael Jordan not long after Coach K first set foot in Durham, N.C., and they lost Antawn Jamison and rookie-of-the-year candidate Vince Carter to the pros only last season.

And they've still had enough talent on hand to make Krzyzewski's life miserable year-in and year-out.

Brand will be hard to replace — he averaged 18 points and 10 rebounds, and at 6-foot-8 and 270 pounds, he occupied opposing defenses like few players in the college game can.

But despite the possibility that William Avery and freshman Corey Maggette are considering following Brand's career path, they will almost certainly return along with Shane Battier and Chris Carrawell.

And Krzyzewski has signed letters of intent from four McDonald's All-America high school stars.

The uninterrupted flow of high school talent is why the top college coaches no longer get worked up when a teen-ager tells them he'll be opting for a seven-figure paycheck next fall rather than fifth-semester math.

It's also why those same coaches like to turn the question, "How will college basketball survive without these kids?" on its head.

What they ask instead is "How will the NBA survive with them?"

This year's draft, thankfully, will be thin on knuckleheads. Unfortunately, though, it will be even thinner on talent.

Besides Brand, the only underclassmen whose announcements have merited any attention are Maryland's Steve Francis, St. John's Ron Artest and Missouri's Albert White.

They could be joined by Connecticut's Richard Hamilton, Michigan State's Mateen Cleaves, UCLA's Baron Davis, Rhode Island's Lamar Odom and Auburn's Chris Porter in any combination.

Then again, none of them may elect to come out. That leaves seniors Wally Szczerbiak of Miami of Ohio, Duke's Trajan Langdon, Arizona's Jason Terry and a host of no-names and foreign names that even dedicated draftniks will be struggling to identify by the time the second round rolls around.

"The problem the last couple of years," chief NBA scout Marty Blake said, "is that every kid who has one good game hears from somebody that he ought to come out. Usually, the exact opposite is true."

Had everybody who could have stayed in school for all or even part of their four years, these are some of the names that would have been in this year's draft as well: Kevin Garnett and Kobe Bryant (both went to the NBA from high school), Allen Iverson (Georgetown), Stephon Marbury (Georgia Tech), Jamison and Carter (North Carolina), Robert Traylor (Michigan), Jason Williams (Florida), Paul Pierce (Kansas), Larry Hughes (St. Louis) and Mike Bibby (Arizona).

Think Brand would have left Duke and taken his chances with that crowd?

Think again.

Minutewomen ready for big weekend

By Jason Owens
Collegian Staff

In a topsy-turvy spring season that has seen the Massachusetts women's tennis team playing opponents of widely varying talent, there may have been a time or two where the Minutewomen may have felt a moment of collective doubt.

It might have come after starting the season against Ivy League powerhouses Yale and Princeton, or it might have surfaced after being shutout in a disappointing match against Syracuse at Delroy Beach, Florida.

Whether or not that doubt ever sunk in, it has now been forgotten. The Minutewomen, after starting the season battling the titans of New England tennis, have now found their groove. So far, the Minutewomen finished the spring season without an Atlantic 10 defeat, and are now getting ready for three straight out of conference matches that should provide the tuneup that head coach Judy Dixon is looking for heading into the A-10 tournament.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Jackie Braunstein

The team's league schedule came to a close on Tuesday when they dominated the Rhode Island Rams 8-1 on Upper Boyden Courts. The conditions were tough — the wind was whipping as it seems it only can on the UMass campus — but the team came out focused and demolished their opponents on nearly every level.

The win was the fourth straight for the Minutewomen, a streak that boasts cumulative scores of 29-2 — results that have the team confident and Dixon smiling.

"We played very well," Dixon said. "We seemed to get better with every match."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Gillian Kane

The lone bright spot for the Rams was the strong play of number one singles star Marla Pasquale. Pasquale, the best player on an otherwise unspectacular Rhode Island team, has gone 18-2 this year, and has an overall collegiate record of 38-6.

Pasquale locked up with UMass freshman Helana Horak in a grueling three-set match that saw long, baseline rallies, an often frustrated Pasquale, and a very game Horak, who in the end couldn't avoid the mistakes that cost her the match. The final score was 6-4, 2-6, 6-2 in favor of the URI player.

Dixon was pleased with the way that Horak played, but pointed to two things that led to her loss.

"She missed too many returns of serve. Unforced errors really hurt her. The other thing that hurt her was that she just couldn't string together enough points to get control of the match," Dixon said. "She has to improve on her mental toughness, but that will come with time."

The Minutewomen could have probably swept the Rams if Dixon had chosen to place Ola Gerasimova, UMass' Russian star, at the number one singles slot. However, Dixon was looking to the future by switching the lineup.

"We're trying to change Ola's style," Dixon said. "She's a wonderful baseline player, but so are all of the top players that we play. She's got those long arms and long legs that are really suited to closer to the net style of game."

By playing Gerasimova at the second spot Dixon hoped that she would work on developing her net skills rather than slipping into the fast pace that probably would have resulted had she faced Pasquale.

Going down the list of the Rhody match, it's hard to find anything for UMass fans to frown about. Third seed Jackie Braunstein won easily, 6-2, 6-1. Annie Hamilton dominated, winning 6-1, 6-1, and Robin Lebowitz and her freshman Alie Tross each shut out their opponents 6-0, 6-0.

In doubles, Horak and Gerasimova, and Lebowitz and Hamilton also cruised. Co-captain Gillian Kane teamed up with Longmeadow's Michelle Kuhr to dominate 8-0 in the third doubles slot.

The Minutewomen close out their regular season this weekend. On Saturday they will travel to Storrs, Conn. to face Villanova. Then on Sunday, the Minutewomen have a home match with Seton Hall at 11 a.m. Williams College will also visit Upper Boyden Courts for 4 p.m. match on Monday.

That will do it for the regular season. The team will then prepare for next week's Atlantic 10 championships, but if the URI match was any indication, UMass should be ready.

When Sanjay Garla left college, he doubted whether his classroom lessons related to the real world. But joining AmeriCorps helped him make the connection he had been lacking. By the end of the year, he had launched a public education drive to help community residents get the health care they needed. "AmeriCorps challenged me and helped me grow," Sanjay says. Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care that you don't reveal so much of yourself today that there's nothing left. You know full well that some things must be kept secret!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may feel somewhat uneasy as the day opens, but this is only because you're going to be doing a great deal of inner development starting now!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — There is a lot of positive energy in your life right now, so why are you so consumed with the few things that are not going as planned?

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You have faith in your own abilities, and it's time that you show others that you have faith in theirs as well. Work together in a positive way.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Financial matters demand some attention today, but you mustn't make the mistake of thinking that everything at this time is about money.

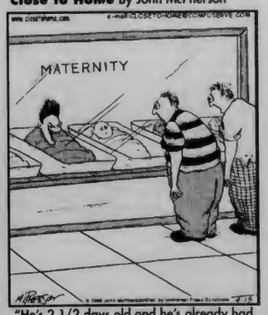
VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — A new business deal is in the making, but things may be going slower than expected. Take care that you don't urge things on too quickly.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Put yourself in someone else's shoes today and you'll realize that things are actually going much better for you than you thought.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Perspective is everything at this time, and it's a good day to adjust yours accordingly. You should start to see things in a positive light.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You should be able to reach a compromise of sorts today, even when you are dealing with someone who is known for his or her stubbornness.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You'll find something extra waiting for you in a place that usually provides nothing more than routine rewards. Things are looking up!



AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Someone near and dear to you may have cause to leave you behind for a time, but there is no fear of permanent rift developing.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Be aware of office secrets today. You may discover that you're playing a starring role in the rumor-mill, and it'll be very much against your will!

Utah, Portland have a chance to take home title

With the NBA season winding down, the playoff picture is beginning to take shape. Through Tuesday, the Western Conference has the top two teams in the league, as the Utah Jazz and Portland Trail Blazers sport identical 29-8 records.

The Jazz, coming off an overtime win against the Sacramento Kings (the two have played three games this season and all have gone to overtime — the Jazz have won twice and the Kings once) at Arco Arena on Tuesday night are running on all cylinders.

Utah may finally have what it takes to bring home a title to Salt Lake City. The ageless duo of Karl Malone and John Stockton are not putting up the numbers that they have in the past, but their leadership is unparalleled.

Also, the Jazz do not have to deal with an Eastern Conference juggernaut, mainly the Chicago Bulls, who have beaten them in two consecutive finals.

Bryon Russell and Jeff Hornacek are averaging 12.7 and 12.2 points respectively, with Shandon Anderson and Howard Eisley providing electricity off the bench.

Critics have always said you can't win a championship without a center. The Jazz have come ever so close the past two seasons without a quality center, and this year Greg Ostertag and Greg Foster have done nothing to better their games.

If the Jazz are to make it to the Finals they must contend with Portland. The Blazers continue to play a solid brand of team basketball that allows them to have five players averaging double figures (Isaiah Rider (15.0), Rasheed Wallace (12.8), Damon Stoudamire (12.4), Arvydas Sabonis (12.1), and Brian Grant (12.0)).

Other players making strong contributions are Jim Jackson and Walt Williams.

The Blazers are coming off an impressive 113-86 win Tuesday over the most talented team on paper, the Los Angeles Lakers. The beating handed down by the Blazers gave the Lakers their worst loss of the season and the point total by Portland was their highest output of the season (eclipsing their mark of March 7 in a 111-71 drubbing of the Houston Rockets).

With the win, the Blazers became the first team to clinch a playoff spot this season. Portland has proved that they can play with the elites of the NBA, so do not take them lightly. They do what it takes to win, which is winning at home and playing solid ball on the road.

• In the East the Orlando Magic have a grip on the top spot, with the Miami Heat grabbing at their ankles.

The Magic are a solid team from players one through nine. Anfernee "Penny" Hardaway is leading the way. He is finally coming off his many injuries and is showing the form that once made him an All-Star.

The two players that have led the emergence in Orlando, though, are Darrell Armstrong and Isaac Austin.

Armstrong, a second year player, has quickly become one of the most feared sixth men in the league. He provides court leadership at the point and is instant offense at 13.7 ppg.

Austin has started all 38 games for the Magic at center. He is putting up 10.2 points and 4.9 rebounds, not great numbers at a glance, but when you consider that he only plays 26 minutes, a game they are great.

Michael Doleac, the rookie out of Utah, is giving coach Chuck Daly productive minutes in relief of Austin.

The Miami Heat are also coming together. The Heat are on a six-game win streak and are playing great hoops. Jamal Mashburn is back after a lengthy stint on the injured list, as well as Veshon Leonard, who started 81 games for them last season but has not seen action yet this year.

Alonzo Mourning can take some of the offensive load on his back with the return of the two guards. With the two out, Mourning and Tim Hardaway were looked at to carry the load, and that they did, by putting up 20.0 and 18.6 points respectively. With the team now back to form, look for the Heat to come out of the East.

With a win over the Bulls on Tuesday coach Pat Riley moved into sole possession of third place on the all-time wins list with 939. Riley passed Red Auerbach and now trails Bill Fitch by just five and the immortal Lenny Wilkens.

On Saturday, the Heat held the Bulls to an NBA record for least number of points in a game (49) since the induction of the shot clock in 1954. In this devastating game the Heat also held the Bulls to record low of 18 field goals and held them to just 23.8% from the field.

Minaker keeps UM women's lax together

Junior midfielder dubbed "glue player" for her adhesiveness

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Glue (gloo) n. — Any of various adhesive substances that is used to stick things together.

–Riverside Webster's II Dictionary

The Berkley Publishing company, which was responsible for the previous oversight, has obviously come up somewhat short in its research department.

If someone from Berkley had ever seen a women's lacrosse game involving the University of Massachusetts, they would have inserted a second definition for "glue" that is but two words long: Rebecca Minaker.

"My role is kind of to be a connector," Minaker said. "I want to be the first person [the defense] sees when they need to get the ball to the offense. I've always been a midfielder, even in soccer [in high school], so I'm used to being the one who gets the ball from the defenders and redistributes it to the offense."

"I think she does a lot of work that goes unrecognized; a lot of the garbage work, like connecting through the midfield, which is an invaluable skill to give us," UMass Coach Francesca McClellan said.

"She comes up with a lot of loose balls, and really gets her teammates out of trouble by and picking up a lot of passes that miss their mark and keeping possession on our side."

The offense and the defense are "stuck" together by Minaker, i.e. "glue." This is evidenced by her statistics over the course of the first half of the current season. The junior middie has eight goals and two assists on offense while directing her attacking teammates, and her 24 groundballs ties her for second among the Minutewomen, behind team leader Lynne Young by only one.

When Minaker came to Amherst from Newton North High School, she made an immediate impact. In her freshman year, she was second on the team with 22 points.

"I think her first year when she came in, we didn't have as much talent on the team and she really filled a role for us; she was a really scrappy player," McClellan said.

Still now, although she's seen hills and valleys, when quick No. 6 stands at the top of the circle with the ball, opposing defenders can't help but be uncomfortable waiting for the UMass sparkplug to decide whether to explode toward the goal, pass the ball to a cutting teammate, or simply run the offense in search of a more opportune moment to attack.

With any choice she might make, the versatile Minaker can do a serious amount of damage.

New Hampshire and Hofstra fell victim to the scoring burst, suffering a hat trick apiece at the hands of the feisty midfielder. In Massachusetts' first ever Atlantic 10 conference game, a 17-3 pummelling of La Salle, Minaker whipped in a goal and lofted an assist to break up her game.

But to define Minaker as "glue" for only her performance on the field would be severely overlooking the most crucial reason why the two "terms" are synonymous.

After the whistle blows and the Minutewomen are in street clothes, Minaker is one of the most important unifiers for what has become a very close team.

"[Coach] called me a 'glue player', and what I got from that is that on the field and off the field I am a player that is always there if people need someone to talk to or someone to ask questions of," Minaker said. "Being a 'glue player' helps what we do as a team and communicate together — to help us reach our goals as a team."

The ambitious Newton native has created several team "projects" over her two and a half years here that have made immeasurable progress in forming a strong bond between each of the UMass players.

As many coaches know, such a bond formed off the field will go miles in creating a cohesive unit on the field.

The two red, black and white banners that quote the Minutewomen's rally chant of "Together, Roll UMass" that hang on the fence by Totman Field, for instance, are the handy work of No. 6.

"She does a lot of extras that help the team unity," McClellan said of Minaker off the field. "Just little things; team spirit things. [She made] those spray-painted posters up at the field, for instance. She puts them up at the beginning of the game and takes them down at the end of the games."

"I like to draw and make stuff for the team," Minaker said. "I don't know why I do it, I just like to make something for the whole team.

"I like to do something every year [for my teammates]. The first year, I made the first one of the banners. The second year, I wanted to add to it, so I made the second half, that said

UMass softball prepares to face Harvard

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

Heading into today's 3 p.m. doubleheader bout with Harvard University on Totman Field, the Massachusetts softball team has been riding a hot streak. In its last 26 games, UMass has only been defeated two times. Included in this stretch is a perfect home mark of 8-0.

That perfect mark will be put to the test today against one of the best teams in the Northeast region. Although not generally known as an athletic powerhouse, Harvard fields a tough softball squad.

UMass Coach Elaine Sortino knows that even though the 26-8 Minutewomen have been extremely successful lately, they cannot afford to take the 12-12 Crimson lightly.

"[They are a] tough team, an NCAA tournament team last year," Sortino said. "We have two tough double-headers with them. I think they will be a formidable opponent, and I think that it will be some great competition for us. They are a great hitting team."

The Crimson feature five batters in their starting lineup that are batting over .300 this year. Deborah Abeles leads the team with a .408 average and nine doubles on the season.

Harvard will have to contest with two outstanding pitchers for UMass who have held opponents to a .150 batting average through 34 games. Senior All-American Danielle Henderson is 17-2 on the year, while boasting a 0.37 earned run average in 22 appearances. She has also compiled 203 strikeouts on the year and is currently sixth all-time for career strikeouts in NCAA history.

Carrie Jeffries has also emerged as an excellent pitcher in her own right. With an 8-3 record, she has held opponents to a .190 batting average against her while maintaining a 2.68 ERA.

"We have some things we need to do [to prepare]," Sortino said. "We will be fine. We are just going to play UMass softball."

Playing UMass softball has worked so far this year. Currently ranked 21st in the nation, the team is hitting its midseason stride. Today's doubleheader marks the final two home games before an eight-game road trip that will take them up against three Atlantic 10 foes.

The Crimson have struggled on the road this year, dropping every contest en route to an 0-6 road record and an 8-1 home record.

The Ivy League power will face a Minutewomen squad that has been posting a lot of runs on Totman Field. Coming into today's matchup Massachusetts has outscored their opponents 46-1 in the past six games.

Packing the punch for the Minutewomen has been freshman Cherra Wheeler and senior Mandy Galas. Galas leads the team with a .352 batting average and six triples. Three of those triples came on Sunday in a doubleheader against LaSalle.

Wheeler, meanwhile, has collected a team-high six doubles and four home runs to power UMass with 20 RBI.

If the Crimson hope to reverse their road woes and notch their first road win this season they will have a tall order ahead of them to take a game on UMass' home turf. No team has succeeded in beating No. 21 Massachusetts at home this season.

Game one of the doubleheader will begin at 3 p.m. today on the Totman softball field.

UM baseball ready to host Northeastern

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Thanks to a three-game sweep of Xavier University last weekend, the Massachusetts baseball team has a head of steam going into today's matchup with Northeastern University.

The Minutemen, who will bring a 14-11 record to the table this afternoon, are facing a Northeastern squad who has lost its last two games. The first pitch is scheduled for 3:30 p.m. at Earl Lorden Field.

"Hopefully our players will start to realize how good we played [over the weekend] and will be able to carry that out onto the field for the rest of the season," said Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone during yesterday's weekly sports luncheon.

Northeastern (10-9, 3-5 in America East play) suffered a huge blow in the off-season with the departure of first baseman Carlos Pena. The Haverhill native led the Huskies in a handful of offensive categories last season, but is now making a name for himself in the Texas Rangers farm system.

For now, however, Northeastern has been riding the hot bat of senior outfielder Jason Lewis. Other top contributors for the Huskies include senior shortstop Kevin Kim and sophomore first baseman Matt Keating. Both players are hitting at a .343 clip, while Keating leads the team in both home runs (four) and RBI (21).

Sophomore third baseman Michael Lomuscio is the only other NU regular batting over .300, as he will bring a .328 mark into today's game.

The Northeastern pitching staff has been anchored by junior Greg Montalbano. The southpaw leads the nation with a 0.35 earned run average, and has a perfect 4-0 record. Keating has also been impressive in a relief role, as he is 2-0 this season. Sophomore right hander Chris Walsh is also 2-1 on the year with a 3.45 ERA.

For the Minutemen, redshirt freshman Scott Anderson and true freshman Mike Kulak are the top two UMass hitters. Kulak was 7-for-9 in the three game sweep of Xavier last weekend, while Anderson has been the most consistent offensive threat for the Maroon and White. Fellow classmates Aaron Sencz and Chris Morgan have also been top offensive

Teves gives more thoughts on draft; Today's focus is on non-playoff clubs

This is part two of this weekend's Draft preview. This particular article deals with the teams listed by the order of picks in the second half of the first round.

• The Tampa Bay Bucs need to work on the quarterback problem that has plagued them throughout the years. They also need to think along the lines of special teams players as well as a tight end, tackles on both sides and a safety. The Bucs have nine picks to do this in.

You would expect the Bucs to select a QB, but it's likely that the top four will go before the Bucs select unless they trade up. Don't hold your breath.

They will select on offensive lineman like Matt Stinchcomb (Georgia), L.J. Shelton (Eastern Michigan) or John Tait (BYU) at the tackle position.

Then they would probably select Joe Germaine (Ohio State) or Shaun King (Tulane), who could end up being the steal of the draft. They would likely select a QB in the second or third round.

Look at some point for the Bucs to draft kicker Jeff Hall (Tennessee) and punter Hunter Smith (Notre Dame) to strengthen their incredibly weak special teams.

• The Tennessee Oilers (oh, I mean the Titans) need to improve their defense quite considerably to make an impact this year. They were competitive last year, but if they substantially improve their defense they could compete for the division title this year, making this their most important draft in years.

The likely place to start for the Titans is at the defensive end spot, where they need to draft solid pass rushers. The Titans are seriously looking to take one of the top four D- ends in the draft, since Jevon Kearse (Florida) is out of reach, they will need to select Lamar King (Saginaw Valley), Ebenezer Ekuban (North Carolina) or Patrick Kerney (Virginia).

With those kinds of options at D-end, they might solidify another position early and make their second pick a solid pass rusher.

• The Seattle Seahawks were robbed of a trip to the playoffs by an official's call in the Jets game last season, and will be right back in the hunt this year. They will make it this year after they draft Cade McNown (UCLA) with the 17th pick in the draft, and then select

Patil Teves

I.C. Stevens (North Carolina) or Karsten Bailey (Auburn) as the receivers they want.

They will also need to acquire a lineman with their three other picks. The Seahawks need lineman both on the defensive and offensive sides of the ball.

• The Oakland Raiders — where do we begin with this team? This is not a team on the rise like the Cardinals, the Seahawks, or even the Titans. They need to rebuild once again because it seems like things aren't improving regardless of who comes to play for the Silver and Black.

The Raiders are looking to begin the process of rebuilding once again with a D-end who can pass rush, including many of the guys already mentioned at that position. They also want to find a good outside linebacker who can also do some damage.

They might be looking to acquire Rahim Abdullah (Clemson) to hopefully shore up that position for the

Buchanan visits UMass, discusses culture crises

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

One does not usually think of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst as a bastion of conservatism. Yet over 50 people attended "The Culture Wars", a speech given by Republican political analyst Angela "Bay" Buchanan, in the Campus Center yesterday.

Buchanan was sponsored by the Young America's Foundation, and the UMass Republican Club. "It came as a surprise that the People's Republic (of UMass) even had a Republican club," she said.

Buchanan is a former Treasurer of the United States, and she served as campaign chairperson for her brother Pat Buchanan's presidential campaigns. She is also a political commentator for the television shows "Good Morning America" and "Equal Time."

She spoke about the importance of "American culture" in our society.

"What makes our nation great is that its culture binds us together as one," she said, "and that's what we have to encourage."

She claimed that our culture is being threatened by a destruction of the family system.

"So many children are being raised by single moms, and so you just don't have that structure anymore," she said. "It doesn't matter what your economic situation is."

Buchanan blamed the deterioration of the family structure partly on the sexual revolution, which she called "enormously devastating."

"As a direct result of that, you have abortions out there, you have the highest rate of divorce in the Western world," she said. "This isn't good for women. Divorce causes enormous problems for women."

"You see sexual promiscuity out there, you see drugs, you see suicides," she added. "This doesn't go back to economics. It goes back to the family."

Buchanan also gave her views on contemporary political issues. She attacked affirmative action, saying, "You can't justify getting rid of discrimination by discriminating against another group," and spoke out against other "multicultural" programs like African-American cultural centers on college campuses, and bilingual education.

According to Buchanan, liberals use "the politics of intimidation" to silence conservative viewpoints.

"On issues like affirmative action," she said, "when you say, 'I'm against it,' somebody turns and says, 'You're racist.'"

While Buchanan was speaking, students wrote questions on index cards for her to answer after her speech.

One audience member asked, "In the wake of the Matthew Shepherd murder, how do you feel about hate-crimes laws?" Buchanan responded, "I am so utterly opposed to hate- crimes legislation...equal justice should apply to crimes, whether the victim is black, hispanic, gay, or anything else. What's the statement that we're making - that it's worse to beat up a black person than it is to beat up a white person?"

Overall, the audience was very supportive of Buchanan's views.

"Mrs. Buchanan seemi like a very thoughtful woman who speaks about compassion conservatism," said Rod Snelling, a UMass alumnus. "That should hearten Americans who have concerns with our culture and our economy."

Not all of those in attendance shared such a positive reaction, though.

"She said things about hate-crimes laws that were completely untrue," said Cara Andretti, an undeclared sophmore. "Someone doesn't get punished more if their victim was black, they get punished more if the (crime was commited) because the victim was black."

"She talks about family and things like that," Andretti added, "but her issues are totally backward."

Clinton talks of rebuilding Balkan area

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A post World War II-type reconstruction plan will be needed in the Balkans once the current conflict there is over, but the region "will never be safe with a belligerent tyranny in their midst," President Clinton said yesterday. Clinton invited Russia to join Western allies in protecting the security and self-government of a Kosovo to which ethnic Albanians have returned once peace is achieved.

Speaking before the annual convention of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Clinton vowed anew that NATO will prevail and reverse Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic's forced expulsion of hundreds of thousands of ethnic Albanians from Kosovo.

"We cannot allow the Milosevic vision — rooted as it is in hatred and violence and cynicism — to prevail," he declared, envisioning a future when the nations of southeastern Europe choose peaceful integration and ethnic tolerance.

Outside the Nob Hill hotel where he spoke, about 50 protesters carrying signs denouncing U.S. involvement in Kosovo chanted, "No war! No bombs! No new Vietnam!" A smaller knot of demonstrators supported NATO with signs saying "Stop the Hitler of the Balkans" and urging the alliance to arm the Kosovar guerrillas.

In his speech, Clinton made clear that he foresees Milosevic's expulsion from power. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger called Milosevic "a card-carrying total-

Bombing protests planned

Western Massachusetts groups will show their opposition to economic sanctions in Iraq and the bombing of Yugoslavia as part of an international day of protest.

The "Anti-War Demo" vigil and video screening will take place tomorrow from 11 a.m. to noon in front of the Hampshire County Courthouse in Northampton. The event is co-sponsored by the International Action Center (IAC) and the Committee to Lift the Sanctions.

Similar coordinated actions are being planned in more than 100 cities throughout the U.S. and around the world.

Nicholas Camerota, spokesperson for the Western Massachusetts branch of the IAC, says there is an immediate need to end the airstrikes in Kosovo.

"There is considerable international and domestic opposition to the bombing of Yugoslavia," Camerota said in a recent press release. "The longer these airstrikes continue, the more we can expect protests to grow."

This event marks the third call for protests against the bombing. A rally was already held in Northampton on March 27 to express the group's concern.

In addition to tomorrow's rally, a video concerning the current crisis in the Balkans will be shown at 12:15 p.m. at the Unitarian Society in Northampton.

UM police get contract after lengthy debate

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

After 16 months of working without a contract, the University of Massachusetts police have finally reached a contract settlement with the University.

"We're all pleased we were able to reach an agreement after a long period of negotiation," Nicholas N. Marshall, employee/labor relations administrator, said in an April 14 press release.

Negotiated by the International Brotherhood of Police, Locals 432A and B, the contract was put to a vote at an April 14 union meeting, and passed by an "overwhelming majority," said Brian L. Narkewicz, president of Local 432A representing uniformed officers.

The contract calls for three 3 percent salary increases, effective on January 1 in each of the years 1998, 1999 and 2000. The amount is retroactive, so police will immediately receive a 6 percent increase to make up for the period they have gone so far without a contract. The last contract ended in December 1997.

The amount is not what the union originally requested, but Local 432B president Thomas O'Donnell said the group is happy with the monetary gains. The group is not happy, however, with the compensation package it received.

According to the Massachusetts General Law, the UMass police department is considered the same as police departments in cities and towns. "Yet we don't receive the same benefits as other cities or towns."

Among these benefits is a compensation program for police officers who have earned a higher education degree. Statewide, police officers receive a certain amount of money for each degree they receive. This amount is equivalent to 10 percent of the officer's annual base salary for an associate's degree, 20 percent for a baccalaureate degree and 25 percent for a master's or doctoral degree, O'Donnell explained.

The new UMass police contract supplies $1,000 per year for an associate's degree, $2,000 for a baccalaureate degree and $2,500 for a master's or doctoral degree — an amount that is "not nearly" equivalent to what is received by other police departments state-wide, O'Donnell said.

"As least we put our foot in the door," he said. "We're happy with it [the contract], but we're not going to stop fighting."

The process is supposed to take place every few years, O'Donnell said. But because of the length of the recent negotiations, the union will soon have to return to the bargaining table and begin contract negotiations all over again for the year 2001.

Student groups host Earth Day festivities

In recognition of Earth Day, MassPIRG and Orchard Hill Residential Area staff are organizing different Earth Day events on the University of Massachusetts campus.

MassPIRG will be kicking off its Earth Day activities this Sunday from 1 p.m. to 7 p.m. in Polaski Park in Northampton.

"We're calling it a day of celebration, education and action," MassPIRG campus organizer Jay Rasku said.

More than 20 representatives from volunteer environmental groups will be on hand to encourage people to take action towards improving the environment.

Participants will get the opportunity to have their voices heard by signing letters and petitions to be sent to the government. Individuals can also appear on a videotape to be sent to Governor Paul Cellucci, addressing the need to reduce power plant pollution.

Representative John Olver will be present during the festivities. A rally against air pollution is also scheduled for 2:30 p.m.

Other events include face painting, murals, music and a feature of upcoming MassPIRG projects including a 5K walk to benefit of asthma research.

Orchard Hill's Earth Day activity will be held on Monday, April 19 from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. in the Orchard Hill Bowl. Featured at the event is a project to improve the Bowl area by placing free-standing benches around the Orchard Hill Bowl and making a stone pathway leading to Webster Residence Hall.

Student businesses enjoy success, film at banquet

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

A banquet to highlight and celebrate the success of eight student-run businesses on the University of Massachusetts campus was held Thursday night, bringing together approximately 160 student managers.

The fourth annual awards banquet, which was organized and prepared by the Board of Student Businesses, included a dinner catered by Earthfoods and designed by the Craft Center, as well as a documentary on the businesses.

The student-run businesses recognized were: Tix Unlimited, Greenough Snack Bar, Sylvan Snack Bar, People's Market, Sweets N' More, Bicycle Co-op, Earth Foods and Campus Design and Copy.

Opening the event, Gloria Brown, a consultant for the Center for Student Businesses and hostess for the evening, spoke of the success the eight current businesses are experiencing this year, marking it as the most profitable thus far.

Brown, a senior School of Management and psychology student, also expressed her concern, like many students in attendance, about the recent issue of privatization, a recurring theme of the evening.

Despite the fear that privatization might endanger their businesses, everyone at the banquet joined together to recognize the hard work many had contributed to making the program a success.

An award was given to Larry Davis, a retired fire and safety officer, who was honored with an apron for the time and effort he has dedicated in helping the businesses.

The other award of the evening was given to Katja Hahn, Campus Activities director of student-run businesses. Hahn was given the Lifetime Achievement Award. One student stated, "She is always there to be encouraging and she understands how important the struggle is." Others also gave their recognition to Hahn for helping them become the people they are today.

However, the main event of the dinner was the showing of Tony Baptiste's documentary on the student-run businesses. Baptiste, a senior psychology major, did the documentary as part of an independent study under Hahn.

Baptiste, a former board member of the Center for Student Businesses, expressed his feelings on his work with the group, saying, "The program has impacted my life drastically and has helped me to grow."

The film, which took viewers on a tour of the eight businesses, spoke for itself. It demonstrated the sentiments of many of the students present by explaining how the businesses had enhanced their lives. They had learned not only how to run a business by applying the skills they were learning in the classroom, but made strong bonds with fellow students.

The occasion was a reinforcement of how unique the student-run businesses are on campus. As Brown stated, "No other college supports such a program. Nothing can compare."

itarian" and said it was hard to imagine him ever being elected democratically.

The president said he does not support ethnic Albanians' calls for independence in Kosovo, a province of Serbia, Yugoslavia's dominant republic. He said Kosovo lacks the resources and infrastructure to stand alone.

But he said a peaceful future "realistically... will require a democratic transition in Serbia, for the region's democracies will never be safe with a belligerent tyranny in their midst."

Answering editors' questions, Clinton said he feels no need to respond to radio talk show critics who claim he lacks the moral authority to be commander in chief. "This is a democracy and people can say whatever they want to say," he said.

To a complaint about a lack of information about bombing damage and military progress, Clinton said the Pentagon should "get more information out more quickly."

He said the Pentagon had problems working through the NATO command structure in Europe, adding that bad weather had complicated the problems. "I'm aware that this is a difficulty, I agree that we should try to do more," he said.

Acknowledging that a NATO pilot fired Wednesday on a convoy in Kosovo containing civilians, Clinton said civilian causalities were inevitable. "You cannot have this kind of conflict without some errors like this occurring," he said.

Clinton said the United States has contributed $150 million to aid refugees and is willing to do more to promote peace and integration.

"To achieve that future," he said, "we must follow the example of the World War II generation by standing up to aggression and hate and then by following through with a post-conflict strategy for reconstruction and renewal."

Time to ante up!

In a turn of events that can only be described as typical these days, UMass Parking Services announced a rate hike for the coming years. Students can expect these increases to occur at rates that perhaps only the theory of relativity explains. Yellow lot stickers will go from $10 to $20 dollars next year and then the next year they will soar from $20 to $60 dollars! Purple stickers will go from $30 to $60 dollars and then to $90! Green stickers, which are available to commuter students, will go from $50 dollars to $70 dollars and then to $100 dollars! Where did these numbers come from?

I am continually perplexed at the way this school does its business. The administration seems to take pride in dropping bombshells on the campus community in a real hunt--drum manner. I also have a really hard time understanding why the commuter students are being hit so hard by this — they need to drive here. I may be able to understand the $10 price increase. I can understand rising costs, but I can't understand this runaway pricing system. Parking Services has created this beast by allowing everyone and their brother to have a car here. They created the problem, we shouldn't get screwed because of their lack of foresight.

Brian Lohnes

Another beef I have, which I am sure many others share, is the lots in which we park. I have to park in the yellow lot by the Mather Career Center. Just about two weeks ago I parked behind a station wagon. A few days later I returned to my truck and saw that someone had smashed the windows out of the car and someone else had run into it. They should be paying me to park in these lots. I should not have to pay to park in an unprotected, dirt- and muck-filled parking lot where vandalism is a constant threat to my vehicle.

Parking Services should at least be able to provide security for our vehicles, but their personnel is too busy writing tickets and cruising the campus. The long and short of it is, no one gives a rat's ass if you park in the 15-minute loading zone for 25 minutes to go into a building to drop off some stuff... no one except Parking Services.

"Parking Services should at least be able to provide security for our vehicles, but their personnel is too busy writing tickets and cruising the campus."

In an article in Tuesday's Collegian, Jake Lillien (my roommate) wrote about the proposed rate hikes and spoke with Parking Service administrator Sandra Anderson. Ms. Anderson denied the idea that Parking Services was trying to out-price kids by saying, "If we were trying [to out-price them] we'd raise the prices to $300."

When will parking stickers be $300 apiece? At the rate we are going, that is a real possibility someday. She added that improvements were planned for various lots around campus before the year is out. Forget improvements, blow the suckers up and start again. It would be a lot easier.

Ms. Anderson also said, "My personal opinion is that to go from $10 to $20 to $60 isn't going to kill anybody." Maybe you fail to realize, in your "personal opinion," that we don't have full-time jobs up here. A lot of us scrape for every penny we have, and it's a big deal if someone comes along and decides to lighten our wallets a little more. I appreciate $60 a lot more than I did a year ago and I'll be damned if I squander it on unsafe, unkept and under-protected parking.

I am really anxious for the SGA to do something on this issue. I know that they have no direct say in it, but if the new leaders want to make a good impression, they should start raising a ruckus real fast. Yell, scream and raise hell! Make people excited about student government and what it can do. Please jump on this because the way things are going this school is going to be renamed "We-screw-U Mass-ively."

Quantum Weirdness

Who among us has not muttered at least once, with teeth clenched, "When will the goddamn PVTA get here!?" Most often we ask the question rhetorically; we don't expect an answer because nobody has the foggiest idea what the answer is. But we do assume that there is an answer, that if we just knew where the bus was, what the traffic was like, and how fast the driver was going, and that by calculating all this, we could figure out when the goddamn bus would arrive.

Matt Burke

In theory, the bus schedule is just a long list of answers to this very question. But these answers, mysteriously, seem never to actually coincide with the bus's arrival. Isn't it rather curious that this list always predicts not when the bus will arrive, but rather when it will not?

We'd be terribly naive to dismiss this curiosity as just a quirk in the system. I suspect there exist deeper, massively complex and as yet unfathomed reasons for this eerie phenomenon. The key to the riddle, I suspect, lies buried deep beneath the very foundation of reality itself. The PVTA, in short, has strayed beyond the bounds of classical physics, has cracked its very foundations, and is instead operating in a netherworld of chance and lawlessness.

"Classical" physics describes the universe as composed of a few basic forces and a vast number of bodies, all strictly obeying the laws of physics. If you know these laws, and you know all the details of a situation, you can predict perfectly what's going to happen. This is how astronomers predict eclipses for centuries to come; it's the reason we think the schedule should predict the bus's arrival; it's how you know you'll be vomiting next Sunday morning.

Things like the weather, though, are much harder to predict. They obey all the same laws. They're just very, very complex; we can't yet measure and calculate that much information. In this classical model, though, there is an answer to every question about the future, even if we can't yet figure it out— as with the bus.

But deep down, at the subatomic level, the classical model begins to crack, and quantum physics seeps forth from the fissures. In this freakish quantum realm, effects follow not so much from cause as by chance. Prediction is no longer a problem of complexity, but a fundamental impossibility. The Heisenberg Uncertainty Principle looms large, preventing us from ever precisely observing both the momentum and location of a particle: to observe one quantity of the particle is to alter the other, like taking a flash-photo of the dark.

Particles like the electron, which whips around and around the nucleus, are thus better thought of as "probability clouds" since their precise locations and momentums are never more than mere probabilities. In the quantum world, then, the outcome of events is unclear, the ontological status of the participants is vague, and our knowledge of either is — no matter what — imperfect. Questions about the future may simply not have answers; maybe you'll feel fine.

The bus-schedule itself is a perfect example of hard-headed classicism: "If the bus leaves point A at time B, then it must arrive at point C at time D." It would be better just to think of the bus as a probability cloud. Then we can apply the Heisenberg Uncertainty Principle, whereby observation itself affects what is seen: by consulting the bus schedule, by attempting to "observe" its arrival time, we change its arrival time, like trying to see the refrigerator light by opening the door. This is precisely why the schedule always predicts not when the bus will arrive, but when it will not.

Roll your eyes if you will at my Quantum-Pioneer Valley-Electro-Transit-Authority-Dynamics (QPVETAD), but the bus clearly violates the classical laws of arrival and departure set down on the schedule. We should instead represent arrival time in quantum terms, as a probability, and one that takes into account the urgency with which the observer needs to catch the bus. Thus, as the scientist needs to know how much time, exactly, he has to get to the bus, the probability of the bus arriving at that time increases.

Then, as the scientist's need to catch the bus decreases, the probability of the bus arriving at that time decreases. Thus, as the scientist needs to know how much time, exactly, he has to get to the bus, the probability of the bus arriving at that time increases.

Then, as the scientist's need to catch the bus decreases, the probability of the bus arriving at that time decreases.

Consequences of privatization

To the editor:

Your articles and columns on privatization refer to the pro-privatization consultants' arguments that a "cure-all" exists for any objections to privatization, and they write contracts to cover up people's objections. But they don't discuss the pattern to those "sweetheart deals." Once the first contract has been discussed, or even after it is signed, the private corporations claim they can't make enough money that way and get concessions to modify the terms with little or no public input.

At UMass–Boston, the private bookstore stopped academic departments from running a buy–back and reselling system for textbooks.

At UMass–Lowell, the private bookstore that took over the public bookstore promised to keep all services going, but after a few years it dropped a popular low–markup computer sales service.

At Salem State College, the privatized services on campus employ no students. Students have to look for off–campus jobs.

We don't even have to look at the experiences at other higher education institutions because on this campus. Coke already has a one–source contract that has the effect of increasing prices and decreasing choices. Further private domination of the Amherst campus market will only be worse.

Hey hey, Parking Services! I thought I felt someone greedily tugging at my wallet, but I just assumed it was the Senior Fund ("We're going to buy a tree for the library!"). Paying $60 for a yellow lot sticker is like paying someone to mug you.

I remember junior year, when I didn't buy a yellow lot sticker for the whole year and still parked there. All the way out there. Oh, those were the days.

Things I won't miss: driving past the frats on the first warm day (put a shirt on, fellas), going to the Textbook Annex, dealing with fools who come down to the paper and that feeling of disappointment I get when I come back from break and think, "Oh, this place still sucks. What was I thinking?"

The U.S. is refuge for one

By Laura Forster

[Editor's Note: This is the first in a series of columns about one man's experience fleeing communist China. Names have been changed for the safety of those involved.]

Arriving in the United States three years ago on July 1, Zy found the political asylum he was assured he would in the land of the free. But it is what Zy left behind in his homeland of China that is still fresh in his mind.

Working for the pro-democracy movement was what forced Zy to flee his home in order to escape the Chinese police. Zy went into hiding in October 1995 after police tried to beat him until he told them the names of those also involved in the pro-democracy movement.

It has been four years since Zy last saw or spoke with his family, a wife and daughter who remain at home in the Hubei province of central China. They are still hoping to obtain passports to join the once-central figure of their house, but prospects are dim due to the Chinese government's awareness of Zy's situation.

As a U.S. citizen, Zy has learned English and is currently taking college computer courses in hopes of getting a lucrative job. Over his first two-and-a-half years in the U.S., Zy experienced the hardship of life as an immigrant who barely knew English. Living with relatives, Zy first began working in a Chinese restaurant located in a poor section of Boston. Zy was often on his feet all day and his pay was only about $1,500 a month.

At the same time as the Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji recently finished a nine-day tour of the U.S. pushing to elect China into the World Trade Organization (WTO), Zy received word that he would finally be reunited with his family. It was said that his wife and daughter had obtained passports. However, Zy said the passports were not even worn in his wife's hands before she had to give them back. She cried for hours. His response to the situation was, "I don't feel well."

A closer look at Kosovo

First-hand glimpses of camps and genocide

By Julia T. Sears
Collegian Staff

More than 100 community members and students gathered on Tuesday to listen to the first-hand experiences of two speakers who recently returned from Kosovo.

"Kosovo: Report From the Field" was conducted by Dr. Jennifer Leaning, a board member of the Physicians for Human Rights (PHR), and Glen Ruga, the Director of Friends of Bosnia based in Hadley.

Ruga, who had returned two days prior, offered history of Kosovo and shared his personal experience. He talked about the past decade and the "mass deaths, brutality and systematic rape." He also discussed the Kosovo Liberation Armies' (KLA) frustration to be recognized by the West because of non-violence.

According to Ruga, if NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) hadn't intervened, there would still have been deaths but not as quickly.

"In an area called 'No man's land' there was a sea of people in mud with mass police. There was little food, elderly weren't getting help and very few were getting through," he said.

Ruga highlighted the differences between the Macedonian camps and the NATO camps set up for displaced citizens. The Macedonian government was transporting people in buses and consequently separating families. The Macedonian camps were "likened to concentration camps, no health care and there were armed guards surrounding the area." There were hundreds of tents set up with limited sewage. Ruga personally carried four people from "No Man's Land" to healthcare tents.

"NATO's camps were reasonably well put together according to Ruga, with tents, healthcare, electricity, and other amenities.

People were shot for refusing to leave their homes, and there were corpses in the streets afterwards. He recalled the story of a Serbian militant who slit the throat of a girl who wouldn't leave her home.

According to Dr. Leaning, driving the distance of Kosovo is comparable to driving from Boston to Amherst; when the roads are clear of police checkpoints it takes about two hours. This could explain why so many people have been able to leave in such a short amount of time. The geography is also similar to the Pioneer Valley, he explained. The borders are mountainous and the middle of the country is a high plateau so the agrarian population could literally climb through the hills and across the borders.

"Twelve to fifteen thousand peasants were clambering up mountains with shells of Serbs shooting behind them for between 24 –72 hours," said Leaning.

Leaning was requested to go on behalf of PHR to teach medical ethics and refresh local doctors on procedures. She talked to one who said, "It is so strange to be arrested and beaten and tortured for being a doctor."

An informal curfew was set for 9 p.m. when no Albanians were on the street. There was also a learned cult code of hand signals where three fingers means you are not in a safe zone and two fingers if you are in a safe zone.

"We did not have attention at pivotal times... now we're paying the price for inattention and experiencing gross killings," Leaning said.

Dr. Jennifer Leaning and Glen Ruga discuss their experiences in Kosovo in the Campus Center on Tuesday.

In response to a question from the audience about how much information the United States is releasing to the media, Leaning said, "I think that the U.S. does know more than we say because if the media gets on CNN it gets to Milosevic before it gets to us."

People who attended the event ranged in age from high school students to retired UMass alumni from the classes of '64 and '65. Kathy Johnson of Wilbraham said, "You get such an interesting feeling about the importance of the timeliness and that it is not like watching television; listening to [the speakers] makes it more real."

Luci Neergheen, a student at McDuphrey's High School in Springfield, came as a representative for a group in her school that forms opinions on international affairs.

Catherine Jun, a student at Amherst College, who had brought in cans for the Kosovo Refugee Relief with the Red Cross said, "No one in our school seems to care about global and political issues. We exist in our own bubble [at Amherst College] and I came to gain new perspective."

Laura Dozen, a Kosovo Consultant to International Crisis Group and a former Balkans-based freelance journalist was scheduled to attend the program. She was unable to do so, as she is still in Macedonia gathering testimony of war crimes.

Friends of Bosnia is accepting donations for Kosovo relief. Call Glen Ruga at 586-6450 for more information.

Kosovo asylum

Dan Ryan

More than 700,000 people have been forced out of their homes in Kosovo. Milosevic's policies of ethnic cleansing and the NATO bombings in the Serbian province have forced residents to seek refuge in the neighboring states of Albania, Former Yugoslav Republic (FYR), Macedonia and Montenegro. From crowded refugee camps along the Kosovo border, they hope the violence will subside so they can return home soon.

Next semester, I will be traveling to Germany to provide refugee assistance through an internship with the Red Cross where I will work with refugees from Kosovo. The refugee assistance program changes the lives of many.

When immediate return is not an option, a refugee must find a more permanent residence. Many Kosovars have chosen to stay in their first country of asylum; others are applying for refugee asylum in third-party countries.

Since April 5, Germany has accepted 7,918 refugees from the region. Even yesterday, 1,228 refugees arrived in Germany from Stankovec camp in FYR Macedonia via eight plane flights.

Germany has always had the highest refugee application rates in Europe because the German constitution grants anyone who seeks refuge temporary asylum. In 1998, there were 98,644 applicants for asylum. Of that number, 34,979 were from Yugoslavia.

The German government and many non-governmental organizations operating in the country provide housing, medical care, food, education, counseling and other social services. The German Red Cross, part of the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Society) is one of the lead organizations for coordination refugee assistance in Germany.

The Red Cross provides legal assistance to refugees filing their applications for asylum and claiming social services entitled to them from the federal government.

In addition to helping refugees access government services, the Red Cross also provides a number of assistance programs itself.

For example, tracing operations helps victims locate family members separated during the conflict. Communication and information services keep them informed of the situation in their home country. Returnee services assist refugees in assessing the potential for return, and help in the final move back to their homes with safety and adequate security.

Other assistance programs include acculturation programs to teach arrivees the German language and customs. Education and youth programs address the needs of children. Skills training programs help refugees become more viable in the developed German economy.

The refugee experience is a difficult one, but the German Red Cross helps make it a little less burden some.

China facing a division of old and new

One student's perspective of tradition versus modernization

Steven Harris

After having been on the rebound for more than 20 years from Mao Zedong and the Cultural Revolution, China and the over 1.3 billion people who live there are undergoing unprecedented waves of economic, social and political change.

China owes much of its recent strides in modernization to the vision and deregulation efforts of the late Prime Minister Deng Xiaoping. Prior to Deng, China was virtually shut off from the West. And now, as it finds itself in the midst of the "information age," new foreign ideas and styles have begun to steadily seep through the weakening flood gates of the communist government via the Internet, Western television, film and music.

The People's Republic of China — the last of the world's great communist giants — is a nation of paradoxes and extremes. The Chinese government claims to be a communist state, yet at the same time wants desperately to privatize much of its state-run companies. In addition, it wants to begin forcing its military, the People's Liberation Army (PLA), to generate its own income by owning such businesses as extravagant hotels that cater to Westerners. Even such western staples of commerce as McDonalds, Starbucks, Haagen Dazz and Dunkin' Donuts have found their way into the modern streets of the country's capital, Beijing.

As a country that can tout one of the world's largest armies, not to mention an arsenal of nuclear weapons, China cannot entirely be thought of as a developing nation. Yet developing it is. Of its population of over 1.3 billion, some 800 million are considered to be "peasants," living in rural areas and working mostly in state-run factories or government-subsidized farming. The Chinese population is drastically split between this enormous rural population and an almost "elite" urban population that has access to education, employment and technology that simply cannot be found outside of major cities.

However, before China can fully blossom into the mature economic superpower that the world is hoping for (and at the same time remains wary of), it will have to continue to accept much of its training from the coaching of the West. Still constantly criticized for its violations of human rights, as well as its hostility towards "rebel" Taiwan, China is not being fully embraced by the market-hungry politicians and businessmen of the West. Yet in the wake of this criticism, the United States suffers an all-time low of $60 billion in its trade deficit with China.

The Chinese government, for its part, is trying to push its way forward steadily and surely. Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji has just finished a nine-day tour of the U.S., meeting with lawmakers and politicians and trying to persuade them to help elect China into the World Trade Organization (WTO). But, for a nation that takes great pride in its 5,000 years of civilization, change comes slowly. And, although China has undergone enormous social and economic changes in the last 50 years, there are still great gaps of inefficiency that keep China in the upper class of the developing nations category.

Under the stresses and temptations of international influence and domestic unrest, China at times seems to be tearing at the seams. Yet, through all this uncertainty, the Chinese people have begun to take hold of the new and changing ways of the ever-more globalized world and natural laws of physics — while steering a ship that has such great momentum as that of China's history and enormous population, there are no sharp turns.

Spreading the electronic bug

methodmaniaKal comes out of hiding

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

With the abundance of student bands in the Valley, it is always a good thing to see one come out of hiding. Formed by two UMass students, methodmaniaKal will be playing their first gig in quite some time Saturday night at Gabby's in Westfield. Made up of "denonymous" Mike Johnson and "TrAuMaHoUnd" Tyler Krapta, methodmaniaKal has been doing its part to spread "the virus of electronic deviance" around the Valley.

Formed a little over a year ago, methodmaniaKal has one demo release to its credit, "A Squalling Birth" (1998), and has played at such venues as Club Metro in Northampton. The Florence duo, originally from Holliston, Mass., is thrilled at the prospect of playing its first show in a while.

Consisting of Krapta on vocals and electronics and Johnson on guitars and additional programming, the band cites such influences as Wumpscut, KMFDM, Skinny Puppy, The Crystal Method, Prodigy and Atari Teenage Riot. When trying to sum up their basic sound, Johnson says, "We're industrial dance, I guess."

Discussing the origins of the band, Johnson says, "The core unit of myself and Tyler goes back years. Four years ago we formed The Laughingstock with J. Taintor; we played a few shows, recorded a couple of demos and spiraled downward to a pitiful death. Tyler and I kept in touch, and formed methodmaniaKal."

"We both program the drum and the synth tracks," says Krapta of the lack of a bassist or drummer. Johnson adds, "[The drummer's] right there in the box. We played with a drummer in previous bands and it seems to be the nexus of all problems. Basically, a sequencer won't fuck your girlfriend, drink your beer, screw up the tempo or talk to the audience in between songs. The only negative we can find is that it doesn't throw in for studio time."

methodmaniaKal will be performing with TMC and Genocide at Gabby's in Westfield Saturday April 17, at 7 p.m. Check out www.ultranet.com/~freak7/mamiakal.html for a $- off admission flyer

Wilco to grace Noho Monday

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

No Depression mainstays Wilco will be gracing the Valley with their sweet pop sounds Monday (Patriots Day!) night when they take the stage at Pearl Street Nightclub. With a lot of good concerts coming to the area, Wilco could provide the perfect ending to a long weekend full of quality music.

In town behind their new, brilliant album Summer Teeth, it will be interesting to see what songs they choose from their catalog. Their new album is dotted with odd sounds, which could be hard to replicate on stage. Also, their new album is very different from the country-inflected garage sound of their first two albums, AM and Being There. The night promises to be, at the very least, a lot of fun.

The new album has received a lot of praise lately and the the band seems to be constantly poised at the brink of mainstream acceptance.

Wilco lead singer Jeff Tweedy has been around for awhile, cutting his teeth in what some consider the father of No Depression — the burgeoning genre of neo-country bands that takes its name from a magazine which covers the scene — bands, Uncle Tupelo, and more recently the semi- supergroup Golden Smog, with the Jayhawks' Gary Louris, Big Star's Jody Stephens and Soul Asylum's Dan Murphy. He brings a pedigree to Wilco, which may explain the polish and the confidence behind the songs he writes.

The first album, AM, introduced the band as a talented foursome, a fact reinforced by the great single "Box Full of Letters," which received a bit of airplay, but certainly not enough. "I just can't find the time, to write my mind the way I want it to read," Tweedy sings in the chorus.

Their next album, the double album Being There, introduced them as critical favorites, popping up on more than one critic's top-ten list. The schizophrenic (in a good way) album is lit up by rave-ups like "Monday," but also has such quiet numbers as "Sunken Treasure" and the old-school country of "Forget the Flowers."

The new album is terrific, sunny and poppy, with a hint of darkness in Tweedy's voice. Highlights include the sunny "I'm Always In Love," "Via Chicago," "A Shot in the Arm" and the title song. The fun of the album is evident in the fact that there are not one, but two hidden tracks — "Candyfloss," and a slightly different version of "A Shot in the Arm." This album should guarantee that Wilco will see those top-ten lists again.

Joining Wilco on the bill will be Vic Chestnutt, a musician whose sound can best be described as "eccentric." Employing everything from horns to everyday objects, you can boil his music down to folk, but Chestnutt makes it as hard as possible to pin his sound down to one genre.

Many may know the wheelchair-bound Chestnutt from the second Sweet Relief album, where his songs were covered by bands like R.E.M., Kristen Hersh and Smashing Pumpkins, which say something about the respect accorded to Chestnutt by music industry peers.

All in all, the show will definitely be worth your Patriot's Day night.

Wilco and Vic Chestnutt will play Pearl Street Nightclub Monday, April 19. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $15, and can be purchased at For the Record in Amherst, the Northampton Box Office, or by calling 1-800-THE-TICK.

Women's crew goes to NU

By Chris Spring
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's crew team heads back into action this weekend with a trip down to New York City. The Minutewomen will square off with in-state rival Northeastern as well as Columbia University on Saturday when they take to the waters of the Harlem River.

This is a pivotal meet for the Minutewomen, who are looking to rebound from a sound defeat handed to them last weekend by Virginia. If it is any consolation for coach Jim Dietz and his squad, Virginia was ranked No. 1 in the nation this week by the pollsters. They made the jump up from No. 2, showing respect for their decisive conquest of a strong Minutewomen team. UMass' varsity eight squad is currently ranked third in New England while Northeastern comes in at number five.

Things are even tighter for the second varsity eights as UMass and the Wildcats come in deadlocked at fourth place. In the varsity four ranks, Northeastern is currently in third place while UMass resides in fourth place in the New England region. It is essential that the Minutewomen do well across the board on Saturday if they hope to be looked at in a favorable light by the NCAA.

"When considering schools for the NCAA championship, the committee looks at how well your varsity and junior varsity eight boats do, and also how the varsity four boat does," said coach Dietz.

After last weekend's showing, Dietz laid out the battle plan simply: "We're going to have to come out and cream Northeastern and Columbia. Then we're going to have to go out and cream Syracuse." Those are the remaining races before the Atlantic 10 Championships held April 24 in Camden, N.J.

Northeastern is led by first-year head coach Joe Wilhelm and the team has momentum on its side after an impressive showing last weekend. On Saturday, NU defeated Syracuse and Pennsylvania in the Orange Cup. Syracuse was ranked No. 2 in the Mid-Atlantic region, while Penn came in at No. 6. In a matchup with Dartmouth the following day, NU took home another victory against the No. 6 team in New England.

Columbia spent last weekend participating in the George Washington Invitational. The team didn't fare very well as it failed to capture a single point. This may or may not be a preview of what is to come this weekend as the Lions will look to crash the party. If things hold to form, UMass and Northeastern should be able to out-pace Columbia while they battle down to the finish. The Minutewomen have no other option than to return to Amherst with strong victories in the varsity eight races and the varsity four race. If they can accomplish that, the team will be in good shape as it approaches the remainder of its season.

Michael P. Doyle
Collegian Staff

After a strong showing last week at the Columbia Invitational, the Massachusetts women's outdoor track and field team will travel down south Saturday to the University of Connecticut for a multi-team meet.

Coach Julie LaFreniere is prepared for a challenging meet down in Huskie-land.

"It's going to be a competitive meet, some tough schools there," she said. "It's a good warm-up for [next week's] Penn Relays [in Philadelphia, PA]."

Assistant Coach Elizabeth Zimney agrees.

"It's gonna be a team fight," she said.

LaFreniere believes the Minutewomen should finish at the "top end of the group" in this weekend's multi-team meet.

The Minutewomen will face host UConn, Boston College, Syracuse University, Providence College, Brown University and Atlantic 10 foes the Rhode Island.

The UConn program, usually a strong squad, are having a down year after a head coaching change. Individually, however the Huskies provide some good individual competitors.

On the other side, Brown comes into Saturday with a bull's-eye on their Ivy League backs, with every team looking to shoot them down. LaFreniere knows her team better bring a lot of arrows but thinks her Minutewomen are equally as strong.

"(Brown's) probably the strongest team coming," LaFreniere said. "They've pretty much dominated New England."

The URI squad, who had a good showing at the A-10 indoor championships, has good individuals in every event but do expose a weakness in the jumping events.

Providence will challenge the entire field in distance running, an event the Friars specialize in, and also bring good athletes into every event.

Syracuse and BC, facing the Minutewomen for the second time this season, round out the seven-team meet.

The coaching staff is looking for a positive carry-over from last week's impressive efforts at the Columbia Invitational.

The cast involved in UMass' throwing events has not changed. It is led by sophomores Carole LaPlante and Allison Tostevin, who are expected to place well in the discus. Junior Giselle Nicholas also should provide some crucial points from the hammer throw.

Sally Hirsch will make her first appearance this year in the 5,000 meters. The coaching staff is looking for the junior to push the competition as she gears up for the 1,500 meters.

Junior Elizabeth Sheptyck also is competing in the event. The event will likely be a "sprint" for the 10,000 meter runner.

In the 1,500 meters, senior Nicole Woy and frosh Kristin Ciswoski look to compete well. Freshman Sarah Thoms, after qualifying for the New England Championships last week, has looked good in practice and will also compete in this event.

have been playing well, thanks to the surprising depth of their bench. One obvious stand-out has been the play of sophomore walk-on Bill Greener. Starting the season as the No. 12 man on the 12-man roster, Greener has flourished at the No. 6 singles position, filling in for Fabian Rabanal. Earlier in the season Rabanal was forced out of the lineup due to a broken pelvis sustained in a car accident. Since vaulting into the starting line-up, Greener now holds a 4-2 record and is looking to continue his outstanding play.

The Minutewomen will also be looking for positive output from their No. 1 man, freshman Steve Prisco. After struggling early-on in the season, Prisco dropped to the No. 2 spot in the line up. He has since regained his No. 1 position, splitting his last four matches with a .500 record. He is looking to finish the regular season strong with a pair of victories this weekend.

Although the doubles pairings have been less than productive this season, the dynamic duo of senior Todd Cheney and junior Bo Navarro has been consistent throughout the year. The two have amassed a 6-5 record — the best on the team — and are looking to extend their winning streak to five matches.

Last weekend Cheney not only found two more wins for doubles play, but also found himself in the record books with the most wins ever for men's doubles at UMass.

Cheney also has a chance to have the longest singles winning streak of the spring. He has been victorious in his last three outings and could surpass junior Rob Manchester with whom he's currently tied.

Harvard batters en route to another dominating performance.

Offensively, the Sortino could not have asked for a larger contribution from senior second baseman Mandy Galas, who collected the eventual game-winning RBI in both games. As the most Persatile player on the Minutewoman roster, Galas has effectively hit for power and average. The threat of both deep and short hitting potential continually caught the Crimson off guard.

The Minutewomen will travel to Dayton and St. Bonaventure this weekend, when first place in the conference will be on the line.

Cooke, Travis Veracka and David Loonie are slated to open for UMass as Szado will be waiting in the wings to relieve. Cooke tossed a two- hit, 6K shut-out over Xavier last weekend. Veracka also went the distance, allowing three runs off of four hits while sitting six Musketeers.

Offensively, the Owls have a well-rounded lineup with a team average of .293. Pete Moore (3-1) is a Renaissance man for Temple, heading up the pitchers with a 1.34 ERA with 52 strikeouts. Moore also leads the team with 24 RBIs including a team-high eight doubles while batting .303.

Men's track to Dedham

By Melissa Sherman
Collegian Staff

When the going gets tough, the tough get tougher. That will have to be the Massachusetts men's track team's plan of attack this weekend as it heads to Dedham where Northeastern University will host the NU Husky Open.

After a victorious first-place finish at the Connecticut Spring Invitational last week, the Minutemen will look to be the lead point-scorers again as they compete against Brown, Dartmouth and Northeastern.

All three teams are solid competitors; therefore the Minutemen will have to maintain their cool under fire to stay on top of this meet. This shouldn't pose a problem for them, looking back at their record thus far this season. There have been a number of stellar performances and with freshman standout Adrian Zullo back on track after a football injury to the shoulder, the Minutemen have even more talent to flaunt. Zullo will run the 100 meters and the 4-by-100-meter relay.

In the past it has been a fairly even toss-up among these teams. The Minutemen have won their share during the team's recent history of competition against this weekend's rivals trio. During the winter indoor season, UMass tied Rhode Island for second. Two years ago the Minutemen beat Dartmouth in the final event, the 4-by-4 relay, clutching victory and winning the meet by one point. They will need to give it their all once again.

"We are a well-balanced team and we have good depth. We have each event covered with two or three prominent athletes," said head coach Ken O'Brien as he discussed the caliber of his team.

The team can look to its top contributors for repeat performances from last weekend's meet.

Throwing events are covered by Vic Morency, who has been a prominent presence on the field and a big contributor to the field events. Morency owns the school record in javelin and throwing — a first-place performance of 212-feet-10 inches last weekend — and got a first place discus throw of 178-feet-6 inches. B.J. Cardoza in the hammer will look to exceed last weekend's first-place toss of 182-feet-6-inches.

For the short-distance line-up Tom Toye, the New England champion in the 200-meter relay and a top competitor in the dash, will be expected to stand out. Ben Beraldi, New England champion in-the high hurdles, will be looked on to stand out in the high hurdles.

Neil Concepcion, school record-breaker in the 4-by-400-meter relay, will team up with Hugh Reid, Marc Sylvander and Toye for the relay.

The Minutemen will need to take advantage of their strengths. With many New England champions in several events, they have proved in the past that it's not over 'till it's over.

said. "They are almost expected to beat us, but a win over a team like that could really benefit our program."

Loyola's top ranking may not be in serious jeopardy regardless of the outcome this week, because No. 2 Duke succumbed to the hated Tar Heels of North Carolina earlier this week.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You've been the object of a great deal of attention lately, and someone has you in line for a promotion, but you won't hear of if just yet.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You mustn't take a personal slight too seriously. The person who offered the offense did so quite unintentionally, and an over-reaction is not necessary.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — The time has come for you to concentrate on doing more for your physical and emotional well-being. Take care of yourself!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — A question of "official policy" is likely to arise before the day is out, and you're the only one who will be able to rectify the situation.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Focus on doing things in the most creative manner today. Younger individuals will be inspired by seeing you use your imagination.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can expect subtle changes in your personal life to have a major impact on your professional attitude. Big things often come in small packages or doses.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Someone you've recently hurt is likely to give you a second chance today, so you'll certainly want to be on your best behavior and make amends.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You must pay close attention today to the impact your words have on those around you, particularly when young people are listening.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Take care that others don't take what you say and twist it to suit their own desires. Be sure that others do what you say exactly to the letter.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Once you finish with one task, you'll want to move right on to the next, and so on throughout the day. There's much to do, and not much time!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Thanks to your willingness to admit a past error and make things right, a relationship problem is likely to be solved before the day is out.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You are likely to surprise yourself today by coming up with a valid and profitable idea at the last minute. No one else will expect it either.

UM baseball collapses
6–0 lead unravels to Huskies

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Stealing the fragile strut from a struggling Massachusetts baseball team (14–12, 4–2 Atlantic 10), the Northeastern Huskies (11–9, 3–5 America East) smothered the Minutemen 17–8 yesterday at Earl Lorden Field.

Touching up on five UMass pitchers, NU totalled 19 hits and earned nine walks. Todd Samolewicz relieved starting pitcher Nick Skirkanich, giving up four Husky runs on four hits for the loss. Skirkanich earned a no-decision, hurling 3 1/3 innings while letting up six runs on seven hits. Brian Hourigan, Jesse Santos and Craig Szado also played out the turnstile on the mound.

"It's like we refuse to play well consistently," UMass coach Mike Stone said, whose team booted five errors. Stone questioned whether motivation was a factor. "We only play one game during the week. I don't understand it."

The game started off on a prosperous note as the Minutemen battered Husky starting pitcher Tim Bonehill for four runs in the first. Lead-off batter Shaun Skeffington walked and stole second. Designated hitter Brian Mazzaferro walked, and Scott Anderson reached first on a fielder's choice. Skeffington then scampered home for the first run. Mazzaferro followed his lead and stole home on a wild pitch to make it 2-0.

Batting fourth, Aaron Braunstein, who had a 2-for-3 day, received the second walk of the inning. Catcher Brian Samela, who was perfect on the day going 3-for-3 including two doubles and two RBIs, tacked on a two-run single.

The Huskies would go down scoreless in the first two innings until the third, when they tallied three runs off five hits and one UMass error. In the fourth, Northeastern added five more runs as Michael Lomuscio, who knocked in five Huskies, hammered a two-run. NU's Matt Keating ripped a two-run double to take over the lead for good, 8-6.

In the bottom of the fifth, Samela scored when Seth Kaplan hit into a 6-3 double play. Two more runs in the fifth and one in the sixth increased the Husky lead to 11-8.

"We did a lousy job holding up the lead," Stone said. "We just didn't execute."

The Huskies batted around in the eighth, adding five more runs to a sagging UMass squad. Keating and Lomuscio would each drive in two more runs apiece as Hourigan and Santos struggled with control.

The Minutemen managed just three more hits, including a second and third situation with no outs, but could not produce the important hits to keep NU within sight.

"We scored eight runs but we had no clutch hits," Samela said. "It's like we're in a big pool and we just keep sinking."

Samela cited the lack of consistency over the bumps season. "When the pitcher is on, we're on. But that's a lot of pressure on the pitchers. The defense has to be stable," the senior said.

The Minutemen continue their 10-game home field advantage as they face Temple (15-16) this weekend in a three-game series. The two rivals share the title as top gun of the A-10 East.

UM softball takes pair of wins from Crimson

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Her target was the outfield fence.

As a 5-foot-10 pure power hitter, there's really nowhere else for her to aim. And like all great assassins, she constantly hits her mark.

The element of surprise is no longer a factor for freshman Cherra Wheeler. She can't sneak up on her victims because she's become highly recognizable to them in only a month. But she still swings a mighty bat for the Massachusetts softball team, and she still found the fence with no trouble yesterday during a pair of host Minutewoman victories over Harvard at Totman Field.

She taught her Ivy League opponents their first lesson in the fourth inning of the opening game, which UMass won 2- 0. They had stumped her in her previous at bat. But she learned quickly, and launched an under-handed fastball 220 feet to the left-field fence for a triple.

By the time Wheeler had reached her final at bat in the second game, she made hitting look quite easy, crushing a pitch to the opposite right-field fence for her second three- base hit of the afternoon. Wheeler would eventually score a crucial insurance run for UMass (28-8), which narrowly crept past the Crimson (12-14), 3-1, in the later contest.

And yet, even her coach Elaine Sortino will admit that she did not exactly have her best performance yesterday. The astounding flip side to this coin, however, is that Wheeler still murdered the Harvard pitching. She may have struggled a bit during some of her at bats, but Wheeler had an uncanny knack for making a quick adjustment.

"She doesn't play like a freshman," Sortino said of Wheeler. "She's got so much poise. She learns so quickly. When she makes a mistake she just turns it around and learns [from it]. She's grown. She grows from week to week. It's amazing."

This pair of wins was extremely crucial for the Minutewomen, who often jockey with the Crimson for softball supremacy in the Northeast region. As a program which qualified for the NCAA National Tournament last season (and will likely this season), Harvard provided UMass with a much-needed test.

"I thought these we very important games to us because it was the first time, since we went to Philadelphia a couple of weeks ago, that we really faced a good team," Sortino said, acknowledging the fact the Atlantic 10 Conference does not always provide top-gun opponents for her top-gun team. "I though we played very well, and had great intensity and presence."

Although the Minutewomen held a 3-0 advantage before the final Crimson at bat in game two, the visiting team provided a few late fireworks before bowing out gracefully. Sophomore pitcher of record, Carrie Jeffries, battled back to fan Meredith Bagley for the final out.

"I tend to tense up in the last inning and try extra hard. That makes it worse," Jeffries said of her final-inning jitters. "I had to dig [very] deep at the end."

In the opening contest, senior mound ace Danielle Henderson earned a complete-game, two-hit victory for UMass. The Commack, N.Y. native struck out 13

Massachusetts men's lacrosse in need of a cure

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The doctor is out and there is no remedy in sight for the reeling Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (3-5).

The only prescribable cure at the moment is the No. 1 team in the nation, Loyola, who will visit Garber Field tomorrow at 1 p.m.

"This game represents the last great opportunity for us to salvage the season," senior Jay Negus said. "Of course, we probably have to win all of our remaining games, so we will take it one step at a time."

Tomorrow's affair comes on the heels of the respectable 13–8 loss UMass suffered at the hands of No. 2 Duke last week in North Carolina.

"We gained a lot of confidence at a team from that loss against Duke," Negus said. "They were bigger and stronger than us, but that didn't really show once we got on the field."

The improved mental state of mind, if maintained, can only help against a powerhouse like Loyola.

"We can play with anyone," senior defenseman Justin Koenigsberger said. "Once we stop concentrating and lose emotion, though, we can go down pretty quickly.

That sort of lapse will not fare kindly with Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella, who stresses the importance of playing the upper echelon of college lacrosse.

"These are the teams you want to play against as competitors," Cannella said.

"But if we only play well in a couple of quarters as we have been doing, we do not have a chance to upset them."

The Greyhounds sport a spotless record both overall this season (7-0), and in the all-time series against UMass (6-0).

Most recently, they knocked off Syracuse 10–8, led by a hat trick from Mark Frye.

Frye, a senior midfielder, places fourth on the team in scoring, with 11 goals and seven assists.

Tim O'Shea, a senior attack, leads Loyola with 11 goals and 17 assists.

Aside from their recent triumph over the Orangemen, Loyola can point towards victories over former No. 1 Johns Hopkins 14–5, and "w's" over Hofstra and Notre Dame as their best performances on the year.

In all, the Greyhounds have outscored opponents 92–44 this season, a number that will certainly weigh in the minds of the UMass defenders tomorrow.

Senior goalkeeper Iim Brown has spent the majority of time between the pipes for Loyola, allowing 40 tallies, saving 74 shots, while logging 385 minutes played.

On the other side of the field, UMass keeper Chris Campolettano will look to end the current two-game Minutemen slide.

In his first full season in net, Campolettano has done an admirable job considering the stiff level of competition he has faced.

The sophomore from Massapequa, N.Y., has saved 94 shots, allowing 57 goals in 409 minutes of action.

Entering a game of this obvious magnitude, Cannella stresses that Campiettano and the rest of his troops should take a focused yet calm approach to the task at hand.

"I feel we have less to lose than a team like Loyola has," Cannella

UM deals with "L's"

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

A wise man once said that complacency is the slayer of giants. That was precisely the lesson learned by the Massachusetts women's water polo team at last weekend's Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championships.

Riding a ten-game win streak and a wave of confidence into the tournament, the No. 9 Minutewomen were humbled by host Princeton in a 7-3 loss and flattened by Maryland in a heart-wrenching 6-5 double-overtime defeat. Convincing wins over also-rans Bucknell and Harvard did little to relieve the sting left by UMass' first East Coast losses of the '99 campaign.

"ECAC's were a real wake-up call for us," said junior two-meter Marci Hupp. "We found out that we're not indestructible after all."

This lesson in humility could not have come at a better time for the 21–6 Minutewomen, who will travel this weekend to Boston's Wesleyan University for the New England Championships. Last year, UMass knocked off M.I.T., Wellesley, and Harvard en route to the Maroon and White's second consecutive New England title.

Those same teams will comprise this year's field, along with host Wesleyan. And despite UMass' past success against these teams, it is unlikely that the Minutewomen will overlook the importance of this tourney.

"We need to approach each game this weekend with as much effort and intensity as possible," said Junior field player Laurie Edwards, who sat out the ECAC's with an illness and was sorely missed. "This is a great opportunity for us to come together and start feeling better about ourselves again."

The tough losses at Princeton also gave UMass some indications as to what areas need work before the Eastern Championships, slated for the weekend of April 23rd in Cambridge. The defending champion Minutewomen will use the New Englands as a proving ground for a number of late- season adjustments.

"We've spent a lot of time fine-tuning in practice, changing up our offense and incorporating some new strategies," said Hupp, who earned a little redemption with a pair of goals in Saturday's Bucknell win.

Edwards agrees. "[ECAC's] were a preview to Easterns– a sort of reality check," said the Michigan native. "Without it, we could've gone into Easterns flat."

Instead, the Maroon and White have begun to brew up a bona fide rivalry with the likes of Maryland and Princeton, teams that will undoubtedly stand between UMass and another Eastern Championship. Both squads have puzzled the Minutewomen throughout the '99 season, using complex defensive schemes to shut down the usually dominant UMass offensive attack.

"We're finally learning how to deal with their drops," said Hupp, referring to the double-teaming prevalent in both the Tiger and Lady Terp defenses. "In the past, when they would drop on us, we'd get nervous and screw up our shot placement."

Coach Dan McOsker believes the losses against Maryland and Princeton can be attributed to a much simpler phenomenon, overconfidence.

"Dan gave a very simple reason for those losses," said Edwards. "We just went in too cocky, and overlooked those games and opponents."

That scenario won't be repeated in Boston, according to Hupp. "We're especially pumped now, and extremely focused," said the Ohio native. "As long as we're on the same page, there's no reason we can't come out of this tournament on top."

UM women's lax to battle Temple

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team heads into what will be one of the biggest weekends of the season in terms of postseason. The Minutewomen (6–4, 1–0 Atlantic 10) will battle the Temple Owls (4–7, 3–0 in A-10) today and the St. Joe's on Sunday afternoon in Philadelphia.

The Owls enter today's contest looking to make a statement, with UMass already at 3–0 in the conference. The Owls record is deceiving having only won four games, but all of the Owls losses have come to ranked opponents. The loss to BU came before the Terriers were ranked. The game with the Owls is definitely the most important of the weekend for the Minutewomen.

"We are going to continue to work on our team ball and our set-ups which are getting more under control and more finished. Keep getting individuals confidence up," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "Temple has had some injuries like us. If we can stay relaxed, but stay clear on the details, we'll have a good game."

UMass will count on several different players to contribute in today's matchup.

Melissa Anderson has to continue to be a consistent force for the Minutewomen as she currently has collected 18 goals while tallying two assists.

Laura Koruiz has exploded from her slum, scoring 13 goals and five assists. The Minutewomen are also receiving consistent play from Noelle Gorski, who is quietly having herself quite a productive offensive season. Gorski has compiled 12 goals and added five helpers to give 17 points, and third on the team in scoring.

Other consistent players include Rachel Ingraffea, Rebecca Minaker and Sara MacNabb, who have combined for 32 points between the three of them. Melissa Miele has been phenominal as she has been on a tear lately scoring seven goals this season, four of them coming in the last two games against La Salle and UConn.

The Minutewomen will need to watch players such as Nicole Ross and Kelly Ruch, who have combined 67 goals and 84 points. They will also need to follow Noelle Cebron who has posted 11 goals and eight assists of her own. UMass will likely counter the Owls offensive stars Lynne Young, Denise Brey and Jessica Passanese.

"Temple is kind of a milestone for us, all our big games at the end of the season and have kind of gotten into some easier teams, not to give them any less credit than they deserve," Young said. "I think Temple is just a reality check, but I think if we play the way we've been playing lately, if we keep doing this team ball the way we are, then we're unstopable."

Another key to stopping Temple's attack will be the play of Jen Nardi. Nardi has been spectacular as of late, putting up a .721 save percentage, and a 7.07 GAA, leading the Minutewomen to a 3–2 mark while playing in the cage.

Another key for the Minutewomen will be starting off fast and maintaining that momentum throughout the 60 minutes. UMass has struggled during the course of this season to be consistent.

"We talked about it at halftime — and we kind of decide once we have a big lead that we didn't need to score anymore goals, that's the mentality that we've taken," Young said of the teams second half fall-offs. "Our defense stays strong but once our defense gets tired and the offense is not scoring goals, then we tend to let teams back in. The one flaw I would love to correct before the end of the season is to see us go on a run at the end of a game."

The Minutewomen will also need to make their mark this weekend in order to set the tone for the rest of their A-10 schedule, which comes after the all important Temple contest.

"We've got the strongest A–10 teams down the we-have-to-beat stretch— not only do we have to beat Temple but we have to beat Virginia Tech and Duquenne," McClellan said of possible premature tourney talk, and the overlooking of Temple.

UM tennis comes home for matches

The UMass men's tennis team will have its first home matches of the season startling today, as it looks to rebound from last week's tough losses to Villanova and Dayton.

The team will face the University of Hartford at the Upper Boyden Courts at 3 p.m. The Minutemen have had little success against UH in the past; their all-time record against UH is a paltry 4–12, which UM will look to improve upon this time out.

After the match against Hartford, the Minutemen host Seton Hall on Saturday at 1 p.m. The meeting is the second between the two schools. UMass currently leads the series 1–0.

UMass is hoping to use these matches as a springboard for confidence heading into the Atlantic 10 Championships. The tournament will be played in Blacksburg, Va., April 23–25.

Despite a tumultuous season wrought with injuries, the Minutemen

Orchard Hill Area residents 'clean up' for Earth Day

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

While many students at the University of Massachusetts may recognize Earth Day, students in Orchard Hill made an active effort yesterday to improve their environment through a beautification project honoring the day.

The premiere Earth Day event was organized by Orchard Hill Resident Assistants Yvonne Yang and Paul Larochelle and was funded by Area Housing and Area Maintenance.

The goals of the event were to improve the image of natural surroundings in Orchard Hill and to encourage students to appreciate the environment they live in.

Some of the projects students worked on included building an alternative gravel pathway from Webster Residence Hall and posting a fence around an enbankment to prevent erosion.

Further involvement included cleaning up shrubbery and transplanting plants around the edges of Orchard Hill Residence Halls. Mulch was added around the plants to encourage growth.

"I wanted to post this [idea] because it's a great way to get students involved and feel like they belong more to the area," said Yang, a sophomore environmental science major. "By becoming involved they'll feel like it's more of a home."

Yang, a Webster RA, worked three months organizing and raising funds

Commuters to give environment a break

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

By bike, bus or foot, the race is on to save the environment and miles commuters travel by car this week.

The Amherst Earth Day Committee has planned events for "Give your car a break week" in honor of Earth Day on April 22. But the events are intended to have an effect that will last all year long.

"Our goal ultimately is to have people think about [being environmentally conscious] on a daily basis," said Van Kaynor, a committee member.

The day designated nationally to raise awareness of environmental issues will be kept in mind by many employees in the area as they compete to reduce the miles they drive this week. Kaynor said he did not know how many participants there would be, but he hoped the events would be "filled to the gills."

All major businesses in the area were invited to participate in the Commuter Challenge. Commuters will use the bus, bikes or other means of getting around to be the group with the largest number of miles saved per person by the end of the week. Kaynor said he hopes 10,000 miles will be saved this year, doubling last year's total.

The winner will be announced Sunday during a parade and celebration on the Amherst Common, the culminating event of the week.

The parade will include the traditional clowns and musicians but also individuals using alternative means of transportation.

It will begin at 1 p.m. from Hallock Street and continue to the Town Common. Then the Downtown Street Festival will begin on the Common. The event, which ends at 4 p.m., will include a ribbon cutting for new bike laners, a skate and bicycle obstacle course, informational booths and a speech by Asphalt Nation author Jane Holtz Kay.

Kaynor received permission from the Amherst Select Board to close Hallock Street for the three–and–a–half–hour event despite concerns that local business owners wouldn't approve the closure. Kaynor said during the March 29 meeting that he had received support from a few owners he had talked to. The Earth Day activities have increased since last year's fledgeling attempt which had only one event.

Events continue today with a continental breakfast of organic food. The breakfast, offered to those taking the Commuter Challenge, will be from 7:30–8:30 a.m. at the First Congregational Church.

A video collage and discussion is scheduled for tomorrow at the Bangs Community Center from 7–8 p.m.

For those needing some help with their bike this week, a bike repair workshop is planned for Thursday from 6:30– 8:30 p.m. at Valley Bicycles. Once the bikes are up and running they can be decorated during the poster making and bike decorating workshop Friday 7–8 p.m. at the Bangs Community Center.

A forum about alternative transportaiton to a car is planned for Saturday in the Jones Library from 3–5 p.m.

The week kicked off Sunday with a bike tour of Amherst and a potluck dinner. Last night local and regional planners discussed transportation issues at the Hitchcock Center.

Police offer free auto etching

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Stealing cars on the University of Massachusetts campus may soon get a lot tougher.

The UMass Police Department and the Governor's Auto Theft Strike Force (GATSF), a unit of the Massachusetts State Police, are co-sponsoring "Auto Etching Day" — an opportunity for students, faculty and staff to get the Vehicle Identification Number (VIN) chemically etched into each of their car windows.

The etching will take place today (9 a.m.–3 p.m.) at the Parking Services Office in Lot 25. There is a $10 cash fee for the service, and the process takes approximately 10–15 minutes, depending on the line.

Car owners must present a valid registration at the time of etching. From that registration, officers will print out the VIN number and a GATSF technician will apply it to each window using a "very weak acid that is reactive only to glass," UMass police officer David Black explained.

The etching does not impair vision, but it will deter theft. "[Because] it costs too much for thieves to change all the windows of a stolen vehicle," Black said. A sticker will be applied to the driver's side window, warning theives that the vehicle has been etched.

As an added incentive, car owners will receive a certificate entitling them to a 15 percent discount off their comprehensive auto insurance. And, Black added, the $10 fee is less expensive than similar etching procedures available at glass companies.

"Auto Etching Day" is being done as part of "Drive Safe to Work Week" and a month–long safe roads campaign. In addition to auto etching, officers have been increasing education and enforcement efforts concerning pedestrian safety, speeding and drunk driving.

An electronic roadside speed board and breathalizer test borrowed from Hampshire County Safe Roads Program are being used at various locations across campus. In addition, officers are distributing flyers to pedestrians and issuing citations to drivers who fail to obey crosswalk statutes.

Rally calls for end of NATO airstrikes

By Jake Lilien

Local activists rallied outside of the Northampton Courthouse Saturday, demanding that the United States lift its sanctions on Iraq and end the bombing of the former Yugoslavia.

Many of the protestors demonstrated in the name of the International Day of Protest, an event sponsored by the International Action Center (IAC), a New York–based anti– war organization. The crowd, which consisted of many Five– College students, held signs demanding "Bring U.S. Troops and War Planes Home Now!" and "Drop the Sanctions!"

"The sanctions in Iraq continue to claim the lives of about 5,000 children each month," said Nick Camerute, a spokesman for the IAC. "Individual humanitarian efforts aren't enough. Only the lifting of the sanctions will end the nightmare that the Iraqi people are forced to suffer."

"I think not enough people know how devastating the sanctions are and the government doesn't care," said Ruth Hawkins, a member of the American Friends Service Committee, an anti–violence Quaker organization. Hawkins claimed that the U.S. sanctions prevent Iraqi citizens from having access to medicine, food and clean water.

As an example of the government's unresponsiveness to Iraqi suffering, Hawkins cited an interview of [Secretary of State] Madeline Albright, in which Albright was asked, "Are the deaths of hundreds of thousands of children worth the continuance of these sanctions?" According to Hawkins, Albright responded, "We think it's worth it."

The protestors also attacked the U.S. and NATO for their role in the bombing of Yugoslavia.

"I think that the bombing isn't solving the problem — it's creating more problems," said Mount Holyoke student Rebecca Emerson. "While I don't think Milosevic is the most trustable, the more we demonize him and the Serbians, the more our view becomes extremist and we can't see anything but black and white."

One of the most vocal opponents of the bombing was University of Massachusetts graduate student Zorana Gluscevic, a native of Belgrade, Yugoslavia. Gluscevic emphatically denied the American government's claim that the Serbs have engaged in genocide and accused the U.S. of

Refugee flee cut off
Crossing point closed by Serbs

By Veselin Toshkov
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Yugoslavia slammed shut the main crossing point for ethnic Albanian refugees fleeing Kosovo, leaving uncertainty yesterday about the fate of the tens of thousands aid officials had believed were on their way to the border.

On the diplomatic front, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan scheduled a trip to Moscow next week to discuss the Kosovo conflict. President Clinton and Russian President Boris Yeltsin held a 45-minute telephone conversation on the crisis in the Balkans, their first talks since the air campaign began March 24. Russia opposes the NATO airstrikes.

On the 26th day of the bombing, allied warplanes struck a government building in Serbia's second-largest city and a television transmitter in Kosovo. But NATO said its operations were limited by poor weather. Air raid sirens sounded in Belgrade later yesterday, signaling the start of more strikes.

Despite continuing defiance by Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic and his military forces in Kosovo, NATO's chief spokesman expressed confidence the strategy will pay off.

"Since when was a dictator defeated in 24 hours?" Jamie Shea said at the NATO briefing in Brussels, Belgium. "It took six years to defeat fascism in the middle of Europe in the 20th century. I think we can take two or three months to defeat President Milosevic."

The bombings aim to force Milosevic to accept a peace plan for Kosovo, a province in Serbia, the main republic in Yugoslavia. Refugee traffic from Kosovo into Albania, Macedonia and Montenegro slowed to a trickle yesterday. The U.N. refugee agency said the Serbs apparently were turning back the refugees.

"It all sounds fairly ominous and we don't know to what end they're doing it," said Kris Janowski, spokesman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees in Geneva.

It was not immediately clear why the refugee flow out of Kosovo was halted, as it had been periodically in past days. The Yugoslav government made no statement on the matter.

Albanian soldiers swarmed around the Morini border station — the main entry point into Albania — and ordered reporters away. International monitors reported daytime shelling along the border, one day after Yugoslavia broke off diplomatic relations with Albania.

The majority of Kosovo Albanians who have fled or been forced out of the Serbian province have come to Albania — 365,000 of more than 600,000. Over the weekend, an estimated 40,000 either left Kosovo for neighboring territories or were at its borders, aid officials said.

"It's very clear that there are large numbers of more people who would like to come," UNHCR spokeswoman Paula Ghedini said in Macedonia. "Either new fighting is preventing people from crossing, or Serbs are preventing them from crossing the border."

The handful of refugees who crossed into Macedonia yesterday said there were many more who had been turned back by Serb police. At the country's main border, Blace, two tractors hauling trailers crowded with refugees were seen heading back from the border zone into the hills.

In the Yugoslav republic of Montenegro, residents of three Muslim villages near the border with Kosovo said the Yugoslav army expelled them to turn their communities into a second front line. At the same time, Yugoslav federal army troops stepped up security along the Montenegrin border with Bosnia. Numerous checkpoints were seen on roads leading toward the capital Podgorica, Montenegro's capital.

NATO, meanwhile, reported that all its planes had returned safely overnight, although a Danish F-16 patrolling Bosnia in conjunction with the airstrikes made an emergency landing at Sarnjevo's airport Sunday night due to what NATO officials said was an engine problem.

The state-run Tanjug news agency reported four powerful detonations early yesterday in Baric, site of a chemical plant 12 miles southwest of Belgrade.

A top official in Belgrade reiterated warnings of an ecological disaster if NATO strikes the chemical plant, although for the second straight night it appeared to be targeting a nearby site instead.

Global merger to create giant comm. power

By Bruce Stanley
Associated Press

LONDON — Telecom Italia SpA and Germany's Deutsche Telekom AG are expected to announce today that they are merging in a mega-deal that would create a new global competitor to U.S. giants such as AT&T.

The move, which would pair two former state monopolies, would be subject to intense regulatory scrutiny and would undoubtedly present the companies with political and cultural obstacles. A Telecom Italia-Deutsche Telekom combination would dwarf its competitors in Europe and would most likely become the largest merger in history, topping the pending deal between Exxon Corp. and Mobil Corp.

A Telecom Italia official who spoke on condition of anonymity said the two firms' chief executives — Franco Bernabe and Ron Sommer — will outline the merger agreement at a morning news conference today in London. The planned announcement ends days of frenzied speculation about such a move.

Telecom Italia may not be the only partner Deutsche Telecom is eyeing. The German business weekly Manager Magazin issued a news release yesterday saying that Deutsche Telekom is also negotiating a takeover of U.S. telecommunications company Sprint Corp.

According to a report to be published Friday in the magazine, Telekom boss Sommer has been negotiating a deal with Sprint Corp.'s Chief accusing the Serbs of ethnic cleansing to bolster support for NATO's continuing airstrikes.

"The American government needs control — economically, politically and militarily," she said. "Your government preys on other, smaller governments."

When approached by reporters, Gluscevic asked, "Can I trust you?"

"I have a very bad experience with American mass media," she explained. "[The media is] manipulating the audience with images of miserable people, [and] stories that have never been verified of raped women, genocide and mass graves."

While many of the protestors agreed with Gluscevic's claim that the Serbs have not committed genocide, some used the term to describe the government's sanctions on Iraq.

"I've actually heard estimates of 6,000-7,000 dying each month of disease and hunger," said Hampshire College student Laura Anderson. "If you target an entire nation, which is basically what the U.S. is doing right now, that is technically genocide."

Executive William Esrey for several weeks.

Deutsche Telekom spokesman Stephan Althoff dismissed the story as "just speculation." Officials at Sprint did not respond to requests for comment.

Telecom Italia confirmed late Sunday that it was examining the possibility of an industrial alliance with Deutsche Telekom. Telecom Italia is known to be seeking a white knight to save it from a hostile takeover bid by its smaller Italian rival, Olivetti SpA.

Deutsche Telekom and Telecom Italia have refused to say how they might share ownership in a combined company and have declined to say how they might calculate their respective values in any merger. Deutsche Telekom has a market capitalization of about $117 billion while Telecom Italia is at about $77 billion.

Italian Premier Massimo D'Alema said today that any merger between Telecom Italia and Deutsche Telekom would require a privatization of the German company.

"We cannot imagine that a privatized Telecom Italia may merge with a company whose main shareholder is the German state," D'Alema told reporters. Deutsche Telecom is 72 percent-owned by the German government.

The Italian government owns 3.4 percent of Telecom Italia, but it has veto power over the acquisition of more than 3 percent of the shares of the telecommunications company.

Olivetti has offered $12.31 a share for Telecom Italia. Olivetti plans to proceed with its tender offer despite the German-Italian merger talks, company spokesman Ugo Panerai said today. Olivetti has already filed a prospectus with the Italian regulatory body Consob.

The Italian prime minister's office has said that any accord must be on an equal footing, underlining fears in Italy of foreign ownership of the strategic telecommunications industry.

A merger also would raise a rash of regulatory issues. Deutsche Telekom has close financial and operational ties with another major telecommunications company, France Telecom. France Telecom said Deutsche Telekom can't withdraw unilaterally from its strategic agreements with the French telecommunications group.

"Our agreements with Deutsche Telekom are clear and incompatible with a unilateral strategic turnaround," France Telecom said. The companies own 2 percent of one another's stock.

Yvonne Yang and Paul Larochelle were the organizers of the Earth Day event held yesterday afternoon in Orchard Hill.

for the project. She feels her experience with the Orchard Hill Earth Day has helped her appreciate the amount of time involved in a national environmental project.

Representatives from the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) set up informational booths to inform students about the importance of getting involved within the community. B.J. Cortis, a MASSPIRG member, feels Orchard Hill is initiating part of a nationwide awareness.

"I think it's great that they're localizing Earth [Day]," said Cortis. "It is a national event [going on among] hundreds of universities and I'm glad UMass and Orchard Hill are parts of it."

Some of the upcoming events MASSPIRG informed students about included the Pollution Prevention Act, Wild Forest Campaign and the Clean Air Act.

The Pollution Prevention Act is of the most immediate concern for MASSPIRG advocates like Cortis, who are looking to enforce the "Toxic Use Reduction Act" (TURA) laws. The interest group is advocating for stronger laws against the interests of chemical industries which are eager to dismantle such laws prohibiting their access to toxic chemicals.

Food was served during the festivities and music and entertainment featured such performances by student band Hurricane Dave and the University's Juggling Club.

While most stood aside to watch the projects, some individuals worked towards providing input towards the kind of environment they lived in.

Joseph Lagasse, a member of University Housing Beautification Services and a freshman landscape architecture major said, "In the year I've been here, I have not seen a group activity to this extent.

"There's a need to help beautify the campus, and the students appreciate it more if they have a hand in it."

Dispute erupts over winning lottery ticket given as a tip

By Garry Mitchell
Associated Press

MOBILE, Ala. — Tonda Dickerson gave her Waffle House customers plenty of coffee refills, and one of them rewarded her with a Florida lottery ticket.

Not a bad tip. It turned out to be worth $10 million.

But then she turned in her apron without sharing the jackpot with four coworkers who also got lottery tickets as tips. The four sued her and claimed she had ignored their agreement to divide any winnings equally — meaning $2 million for each.

Dickerson, 28, said there had been no such deal. She then turned down a settlement offer that would have given her $3 million and let the other four split the rest.

So instead of moving from her mobile home on yesterday, the former waitress was in court. Her Waffle House co-workers testified there was a share-the-wealth plan and that in conversations around the hot grill they often discussed how they would spend the money. "It was always stated that if we hit, we split," one of the four co-workers, Matthew Adams, told the jury.

Mobile County Circuit Judge Robert Kendall said the jury's verdict, expected today, will be an advisory one. The judge will make the final decision on whether the money must be divided. Florida officials are holding the money in the meantime.

Voters in Alabama will decide this year whether the state should have a lottery. In the meantime, lottery dealers in Florida do a brisk business with Alabama customers like Edward Seward Jr., the Waffle House customer from Bayou La Batre who gave away the lottery tickets.

Seward ate breakfast daily with family members at the Waffle House in Grand Bay, on the Alabama coast. On March 7, he handed out tickets to five servers — Dickerson, Adams, Sandra Deno, Angela Tisdale and Jackie Fairley.

Seward, 41, is a former restaurant manager who is partially paralyzed on his right side from a stroke. He has said he only wanted a new truck out of the lottery winnings and expected the restaurant employees to share any winnings. He declined requests for interviews and sat huddled with relatives in court yesterday. The co-workers' attorney, Steve Clements, said the case was about telling the truth and the "corrupting influence of money."

Dickerson's lawyer, Dwight Reid, accused the co-workers of cooking up a "nefarious scheme" to claim part of the money. Besides, he said, there was no written contract to divide the money, and he said Alabama law requires such a document.

Dickerson said she wants to use the lottery money to build a new home on her father's six acres of property near the Alabama-Mississippi border, where she now lives in a mobile home with her husband and 9-year-old son.

The best thing since...

"Sire! Sire, come quickly! It's imperative," exclaimed the simple servant as he scrambled to the feet of the King. "A great discovery has been made that might forever change the kingdom!"

What the King was about to be exposed to was the most ground-shattering of all inventions. This creation, made, no doubt, by a wizard of Merlin-esque proportions, would forever be the standard by which all future creations would be judged.

You know the phrase: "It's the greatest thing since... sliced bread."

Seth Koenig

Before sliced bread, everything had to be compared to something far less awe-inspiring, like the flame-throwing catapult or the Egyptian pyramids.

History remembers the invention of useless crap like the telephone and the automobile, but rarely do the texts refer to the most momentous of occasions: the invention of sliced bread.

"What is this discovery of which you speak, minion," said the King in his degrading, I-have-a-membership-at-an-elite- golf-course tone of voice. "If this isn't good I'll have you beheaded, because that's what Kings like me do when we're at all disappointed — or bored, for that matter."

The servant led the King down all sorts of cold, dark, stone corridors and past caged criminals of all sorts screaming for their lives, confused about why they were put on death row for jaywalking.

At the end of the hallway, the two men approached an old wooden door — because all doors were old and wooden at the time — and, although there was the usual emission of mysterious green light pouring out from the cracks, they entered.

Standing amidst the thick smoke of the laboratory was the Merlin-esque wizard.

"Do you mind putting that cigar out?" queried the King.

"Why?" the Merlin-esque wizard said. "Smoking hasn't been proven to cause cancer yet — besides, we only live to the average age of 35 anyway."

"Point taken," finished the King. "Somebody behead the servant! I'll figure out why later."

The wizard escorted the King to a back room, past other failed creations like sliced hamburger and sliced broccoli, and uncovered his grand discovery: sliced bread.

"That's fabulous!" screeched the King in a historical prelude to Richard Simmons. The wizard demonstrated the fantastic action, sliding a broad sword down through the loaf of bread to break off a slim, delectable slice.

"And that's not all," boasted the Merlin-esque wizard. "I have interns and lab assistants working on the creation of butter as we speak!"

Nowadays, in 1999, we can look back on all sorts of scientific discoveries that have changed the way we live — the fact that the world isn't flat, for instance, or that Earth isn't the center of the universe. Before sliced bread, gentle citizens would attempt to make sandwiches by putting a chunk of meat between two loaves of bread, making choking the second highest cause of death at the time. (The first was, of course, beheading.)

"That's fabulous!" screeched the King in a historical prelude to Richard Simmons.

Two years after the invention of sliced bread there was the invention of cold cuts, completing school lunches for medieval whippersnappers everywhere.

The peasants rejoiced, and the world was at peace.. until the Crusades.

Look on the bright side

Our world is in a state of panic. From the crisis in Kosovo, to the feared Y2K bug, from the affirmative action controversy, to the nuances of DC food — we are all in social upheaval. Every time I look, some new country seems to have nuclear weapons. Nostradamus claims that WWIII is supposed to start this year, and who can forget the invasion of the collect call services (10-10-321, 10-10-220, blah, blah, blah?)

With all these problems in the world today, it's no surprise that people are constantly complaining about things. While discontent is the key to social change (I salute the columnists who give a damn!), people are often stressed out by small, petty concerns.

Shawn Downs

Although I will not go into detail as to what those things are, I suggest a solution: balance your pessimism with some good old optimism. Before you get too cynical, here are some words of wisdom. It is written in the "Book of Boo" that "An true optimist does not deny reality but pays attention and appreciates the pleasant things, envisioning a new standard for society."

We all know that there are problems in the world, and my respect goes to those who seek to improve things. For those who are just grumpy, I suggest taking a break. Appreciate some of the nicer things around us, and save your anxieties for a rainy day (not literally).

Here is a small list of things that we can appreciate on a day to day basis. If we add these things to balance our desire to make the world a better place, we all may live happily ever after. Disclaimer No. 1: I am, by no stretch of the imagination, writing this on the behalf of the administration, which seems to support the status quo.

Look at the weather outside. Even if the weather today is worse than when I wrote this, it is still spring. On average, the air is warmer, the sun seems brighter, and students have finally crawled out of their holes. Enjoy it, study in it, skip class and romp around in the daisies. (Well, you can do the first two things. I'm not responsible for the third and fourth). Disclaimer No. 2: Such pleasure may not be for people with extremely bad allergies, or creatures of the night (vampires, werewolves, Collegian writers).

Even though it seems that the Dining Commons are the butt of every joke on the planet, try to appreciate what they provide us with. Before I get lynched for this one, consider all the work and time it takes for the DC staff to create our meals. The DCs also provides employment to countless students who honestly need money. Granted the food is not of the highest quality, but it is food that we do not have to worry about making.

Alright, let's move on before I get any more chills.

There are many things to do around here, if you just try to look. Thanks to the PVTA bus system (it could operate a little later at night...), we have access to plenty of activities in the Amherst/Hadley/Northampton area. There are theaters all over the place showing a nice mix of mainstream and art films. There are all kinds of cafes out there just waiting to be tried. Even the "Gee Whiz" factor is accounted for by disco bowling, the laser challenge and the roller rink.

There are all kinds of shopping opportunities, from mainstream mall shopping (a small mall), to rural, local outlets. All this and a bag of chips are yours for just living in the scenic Pioneer Valley (minus the springtime cow smell, of course).

Guys, if you get laid, be happy about it, but don't expect it. Even though our macho male manifesto discourages it, appreciate that privilege. If you are in a relationship situation, appreciate what your significant other has done for you. It will: (a) reduce the number of fights you have, (b) make both of you feel better about yourselves, and (c) you will probably get laid sooner.

Ladies, try to be a little patient with your significant other. While it is easy to say that all men are jerks, remember that we men are people too. The next time your significant other goofs up, try forgiving him. We all make mistakes once in a while.

Guys are often more sensitive than you give them credit for, and misunderstandings can cause lots of emotional stress for both of you. If the goof up involves any kind of abuse, destroy him and leave him ASAP. Yes, I'm talking to you. A relationship that is based on hate or superiority is not the way to go, and you would be happier without him.

If you have a message to send out to the world, let the UMass media be your cavalry. If you want to do something on a small or large scale, you as students have the opportunity to become members of WMUA, UVC-TV 19, and of course, the Collegian. By being members, you have the chance to show the whole campus community what you are really made of. It is also an outlet for your ranting and ravings. (It's great for reducing stress and becoming a public figure at the same time.)

There are countless things that you can appreciate every day. For the justifiable things that make our lives miserable, jump on the revolutionary bandwagon. If you just want to be happy, look around because there are things just waiting to be discovered. If life hands you a lemon, make lemonade. Stay tuned for the next episode from the "Book of Boo."

In the biblical sense

They say if you know where to look, you can get a little bit of heaven down here in the valley, but most people get their porn on Route 9.

Actually, no one says that. I just made it up.

But it seems some people prefer their heaven without the porn, telling the world as much in crudely painted words on the sign out front of the porn shack: "Put Family #1."

Mike Messaros

My first reaction was that if God didn't want me to look at porn, he shouldn't have made my teenage years so awkward. But my second reaction was one of epiphany. Me, I've been putting family second, a distant second to porn, for most of my life now (making prank phone calls was third, and honestly overtook family on more than one lonely night), and that graffiti was a wake-up call. Maybe I should be putting family first. I mean, at the very least it's cheaper than porn.

Also scrawled on the sign was the cryptic "Matthew 5: 28- 30." OK, it wasn't so cryptic. Lay off.

As much as I don't like graffiti that requires extra work to understand, I decided to pull the Bible out from under my bed, wipe the dust off and see what the oldest airport read has to tell me about Route 9 porn.

What the passage basically boils down to is that one should avoid temptation (as opposed to every other passage in the Bible): "And if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee." Damn. I need that eye to look at porn.

But it doesn't jibe with an oft-overlooked passage from the Apocrypha in St. Randolph the Chafer where it says "Hey, whatever floats your boat." And St. Randolph was world- renowned for his wisdom (and this drink he made called "The Golden Call" that he would often refer to, giggling, as "blasphemously good"). So who to believe?

The segmenting of religions has reached a point where the Bible has been rewritten to appeal to various demographics. We have the Rap Bible ("And God spoke unto Job and he said 'Who is thine Daddy?' And Job answered unto Him, 'Art thine the Big Punisher? Will you listen to my demo?'") and the Country Bible ("Abraham Foxworthy said to his people 'If you find yourself talking to a burning bush... you might be one of the chosen people'"). Come on, people. And you want to be taken seriously?

Who to go to for answers except the big man himself? But how close have I ever come to Him besides the few times I've had too much cheap vodka?

Well, by some happy coincidence, I met the Good Lord just the other day. Funny enough, I wasn't made in His image. He actually looked more like Ron "Horseshack" Perillo from "Welcome Back, Kotter," and was sleeping on my front porch when I went out to... well, ironically, to buy some porn.

I welcomed Him in and gave Him some warm Peppermint Schnapps and peanut butter smeared on Triskets (my fridge is on the blink). If there was one thing I took from the Old Testament, it's to not cross God, or he will slice you like a pimp on a bad day. He ate it and seemed to enjoy it, even if the warm Schnapps seemed to give Him gas.

"What knowledge do you have to pass on to me, God?"

"Well," He said, clearing his throat. "I've been following the Grateful Dead, up until Jerry died."

"Wow. That gets me nowhere. What about religion? Where is the true answer?"

"It's like, people get so worked up over this stuff... Holy wars, burnings, sacrifice." He said. "When's it going to end? It's like, take a chill pill."

"Hmm. Chill pill. Doesn't sound like divine words to me. I mean, sorry to doubt you Yahweh."

"Whatever, brother. Listen, do you have any weed? Kind bud?"

"Uh, no."

"Bummer. Well, I'm gone. I have to sink a civilization or something," He said, patting His pockets. "But first I have to hit Taco Bell. I've got the munchies like you wouldn't believe. Yo quiero Taco Bell. That commercial's the bomb."

"Yeah. Well, hate to see you go, Son of Man, but it's been a trip."

It was only after "God" left that I discovered that I was missing $5 from my wallet and most of my Ramen was gone.

I was left with one thought and one thought only: What does it matter? We're all trying to impress the same guy, and if he looks like Horseshack, then more power to us all (but I still want my $5 back). Episcopalian, Jewish, Catholic, Baptist — as long as we all agree that the Scientologists are wrong.

Wilson brings Davis's cool spirit to Northampton

Vocalist delights interpretations of jazz classics

CASSANDRA WILSON
Calvin Theatre
April 16

NORTHAMPTON — The evening was magical right from the start. Various band members took up instruments and began playing before Cassandra Wilson slinked on stage in an elegant black dress with white paint-like streaks.

The set started off with "Run The Voodoo Down," from her most recent recording on Blue Note, Traveling Miles is an homage to jazz great Miles Davis. The music belongs to Davis, while Wilson offers her own lyrics as interpretation. Her distinctively low register delighted fans immediately.

The tribute to Miles lasted throughout the evening, with pauses here and there to present performances of songs by Robert Johnson and Jimi Hendrix. "Resurrection Blues (Tutu)" followed "Voodoo," before a delightful rendition of "Right Here, Right Now" with its harmonica and guitar solos.

Solos popped up all night. "Never Broken (ESP)," a piece written by Wayne Shorter, featured a spine-tingling upright bass solo by Lonnie Plaxico and an intricate xylophone solo by Monty Croft. These solos highlighted the talents of the individual band members as much as they did Wilson's. "Seven Steps," another track from the new album, featured a great acoustic guitar solo.

The tempo slowed for Wilson's seductive rendition of "Time After Time," a song written and recorded by Cyndi Lauper, before Davis incorporated it into his own performances. Wilson sat on a stool for her restrained interpretation of this modern classic.

The crowd was soon clapping along to the infectious, blues of "Come Into My Kitchen," a Robert Johnson tune adopted by Wilson. The song was set up by a smoking steel guitar solo from Marvin Sewell. Wilson's seductive voice wrapped itself around the timeless lyrics. It closed with a steel drum solo by percussionist Jeff Haynes that had the crowd yelling for more.

The evening wrapped up with "Green Dolphin Street," a Wilson original, and "When The Sun Goes Down," which had every band member contributing to the pulsing fusion groove. "Voodoo Reprise" closed out the night with its homage to Hendrix and his song "Voodoo Chile."

Wilson is gifted with a voice that is at home in front of any kind of beat or arrangement. She proved during her first visit to Northampton that she can transcend the jazz-artist label she is tagged with. Her recordings and performances are a vital addition to American music.

Jazz singer Cassandra Wilson put her own unique stamp on jazz, pop and blues classics in Northampton Friday night.

Never Been Kissed should never, ever have been made

By Adam Martignetti

NEVER BEEN KISSED
Directed by Raja Gosnell with Drew Barrymore, David Arquette, Michael Vartan
Playing at Mountains Farms Theater

Never Been Kissed is a film so flimsy and so misguided that it quickly crumbles on its own paradigm of stereotypes. In recent memory, I cannot think of a more shameless attempt to capitalize on popular genres — namely the "in" teen movie and the romantic comeds.

This complete unoriginality is glaring foremost in the movie's lackluster writing. It's bad enough that all the age-old high school prototypes are present, but the screenplay is so shallow that there is barely any narrative at all. In fact, the movie lacks any true, distinguishable characters.

Rather the people on screen are better described as personalities — mere shadows of any real characters. Take a young over-zealous reporter, her loser, ex-jock brother looking for redemption, an overbearing boss with a soft side, the "popular" girls, some high school nerds, the dream guy, that one hot teacher — add a sappy ending and surprise, you have Never Been Kissed.

Drew Barrymore plays Josie Gellar, that reporter whose first assignment is an undercover expose on modern day high school students. Along the way, she must try to overcome her past experience as a high school geek. She must be popular to write her story. Older brother helps her and inevitably the conflict arises when she falls for her English (could they at least come up with a new subject?) teacher, Mr. Coulson.

The movie's immediate identity problem arises because Josie is really not that likeable. Sure, Drew Barrymore is indisputably cute and the idea of her being a high school student is intrinsically funny, but she can't act. From her first inappropriate and misplaced speech on fate, straight until her final tirade condemning high school immaturity, Barrymore blunders every dramatic scene she has. Her fake tears and mustered anger reveal that this isn't her forte; she's definitely forcing it.

In addition, Josie herself is extremely inconsistent to the point of being selfish and hypocritical. When she goes back to high school, she retains her former status as a nerd. Two seconds later though, she abandons her only friends, a gang of smart kids known as "the Denominators," for the popular group. In essence, she is no better than the people who used to pick on her. She's just as disingenuous, just as shallow and just as fickle as the high school students she's supposed to dislike.

What little good does come from Never Been Kissed is a result of director Raja Gosnell's artistic sense. Gosnell tells a better story visually than the screenplay ever does. Josie seems out of place as an adult and Gosnell obliges by making her appear awkward. She's a reflection of the shy, ungainly high schooler that she used to be.

Slowly though as Josie reenters high school, her surroundings become more familiar and Gosnell gives the audience a much more familiar picture of Berrymore. Plus, there are some won-

She is also quite adept with the most up to date Oral Surgery Procedures, including surgical extractions. She graduated from Boston College with a B.S. in 1982 and from Tufts University School of Dental Medicine with a D.M.D. in 1986. When not practicing Dentistry, she fine tunes her keene sense of humor by playing golf, traveling, attending continuing education courses and skiing with her 9 year old son, Frank.

Dr. Leonard Talevi

Dr. Leonard Talevi has been on the UHS Dental Staff since Nov. of 1998. He has maintained a private General Dentistry practice in Springfield, MA since 1979. He received his Dental Degree from Boston University, where he also received his B.A. and post-graduate degrees in Microbiology. His hospital residency training was in Oral Medicine with specialty in the treatment of the medically compromised patient. Dr. Talevi is interested in all phases of Dentistry, but particularly enjoys working with the "phobic" dental patient. He finds that real and/or perceived fears about Dental treatment represent the greatest challenge to Dentistry today. A holistic approach to Dentistry is an essential part of Dr. Talevi's treatment philosophy. Dr. Talevi is married with three teenage children, the oldest of whom is a Freshman at Boston University.

Piano rockers Ben Folds Five charm Amherst College crowd

Mathematically challenged piano-pop trio Ben Folds Five served up a heaping helping of pop at Amherst College Saturday night.

BEN FOLDS FIVE
LeFrak Gymnasium — Amherst College
April 17

AMHERST — The wooden-panelled LeFrak Gymnasium was magically transformed into an eerie arena-type venue Saturday night. The dense smoke machine-created fog and dramatic lighting almost hid the faded American flag and basketball hoops suspended from the ceiling.

But the glorified high school gymnasium was no Mullins Center. Nor was it Pearl Street. The sound was overpowering near the stage and barely audible towards the back. The floor, covered with cheap plywood panels, translated the music into an all-too-tangible vibration.

Yet despite all that, Ben Folds Five managed to rock. The group started the set with a song from their upcoming (April 27) release, The Unauthorized Biography of Reinhold Messner. The beginning was a little awkward, and lead singer and pianist Ben Folds admitted the group was a bit rusty after a six-month tour-free hiatus.

But Folds won over the crowd as he began to beat the ivories into submission during the next two favorites, "The Battle of Who Could Care Less" and "Philosophy." The band went crazy during a dramatic rendition of "Steven's Last Night in Town." Bassist Robert Sledge shook his hips as Folds turned into some sort of crazed heavy-metal diva. Meanwhile the crowd was hopping and shouting out lyrics in massive sing-a-long fashion.

It's hard to pin-point one highlight of the show. The T- shirt-and-jeans crowd went absolutely rabid when they saw drummer Darren Jessee descend from his drumset to take the mic for "Underground." They also giggled with glee when Folds started playing two pianos at once — with his feet — and introduced a sure-to-be-hit from the new album, "Your Redneck Past."

Then there was the encore. "Song For the Dumped" turned into an all-out wacky jam session. Folds opened up the piano and started strumming the strings inside. Jessee threw a drumstick in the air, but failed to catch it. Sledge started shaking his groove thang and looked on as Folds climbed on top of his piano, jumped onto the floor, ran around the stage and flailed around, tangled in his microphone cord.

Opening act Fleming and John was equally as energetic and almost as eccentric. Lead singer Fleming McWilliams hopped around the stage in a lilac taffeta mermaid-esque ball gown that seemed to be eating her alive. For dancy Cardigans-esque disco number, "Sadder Day," she pulled out a toy phaser gun while husband John Mark Painter sang into a spacey synthasized microphone. Craziness! Overall, it was a fun, entertainingly wacky evening.

G. Love sends the funk back to 5 colleges

G-Love and Company brought their saucy sounds to the Valley last weekend.

G. LOVE AND SPECIAL SAUCE
Pearl Street
April 18

G. Love and Special Sauce simmered Sunday night, filling the Pearl Street ballroom up with the sweet aroma of fresh- fried funk. And once the lid came off, the crowded club rocked to infectious, if repetitive, grooves.

Born Garrett Dutton, G. Love presented a set that lasted over two hours, showcasing a characteristic blend of rap, blues, rock and reggae styles. Backed by stand-up base player Jimmy Prescott and the elementary drum beats of Jeffrey "The Houseman" Prescott, the band pulled off an effortlessly fun performance.

The night began with danceable, energetic tunes from the group's expansive catalog of music, as well as songs from an upcoming album, to be released in July. The middle of the concert dragged due to many similarly sounding songs. However, the bluesy beat of their most recognizable song, "Baby's Got Sauce," awoke the crowd from a temporary stupor.

Rapping in his city-drawl, G. Love threw out some of his best during the eight-song encore. Coming out first with only an acoustic guitar, G. Love made mellow a little mellower. Songs like "Pull the Wool," "Coming Home," and a cover of the Beatles' "Norwegian Wood" were quietly, and surprisingly, beautiful.

But G. Love insisted on leaving the crowd dancing out the doors. His encore included inspired performances of "Steppin' Stones," and "1-76," both off of his most recent album Yeah, It's That Easy. Finishing the evening was the funky "Cold Beverage," which had the crowd singing along to lyrics like "Some lemonade would be nice, or a Sprite through the drive-thru/At BK, yo I'll buy a girl a drink, but girls got to pay."

derful close-up shots that coincide perfectly with Josie's blissful innocence, including a final scene that almost breaks your heart.

The movie's startling contrast though is that someone as intelligent as Josie, someone supposed to be an adult, would be so oblivious and frankly, so dumb. It's conceivable that Josie is a klutz, but letting high schoolers really frustrate her is just silly. The petty high school politics actually bother her to the point of tears. It's almost as if Josie learned nothing the first time around.

The reckless abandonment of any character development makes the redemption at the end another tired plot device. In fact, the entire movie follows this pattern. There are a slew of conventional types and story lines just tossed together with no logic or continuity. Never Been Kissed actually ends by categorically listing all the obvious conventions that it pawned off as entertainment for the past hour and a half. At least that's original. D+

Taylor awaits NFL future

Editor's Note: This is the first in a two-part story following UMass football player Kerry Taylor over NFL draft weekend.

Lawrence Redford

This past weekend in New York's Madison Square Garden Auditorium, the 1999 edition of the NFL draft took place. Many players went to New York waiting to hear their name from the team that chose them. Even more players resorted to staying in the confines of their homes, surrounded by family and friends, to await the news, good or bad.

One of these players was the All-American tight end from Massachusetts, Kerry "K-Train" Taylor. I had the pleasure of spending draft weekend with Taylor and his family while his future was decided over the course of 48 hours.

Taylor is a native of Mansfield where he attended Mansfield High and was a three-sport star athlete. Named All-State in track and All-League (Hockomock) in football, Taylor was a two-year starter on the basketball team.

At UMass, he immediately began contributing his first year while the other freshmen were red-shirting. Taylor started for three seasons, however, all his hard work came to fruition his senior year. Taylor's 1998 campaign had many highlights: 74 receptions, 854 yards (11.5 avg) and five touchdowns.

Moreover, Taylor was honored as a team co-captain (along with Khari Samuel, who was drafted by the Chicago Bears) and also received several All-America honors, Burgerini and Walter Camp just to name a few. All of these individual accomplishments culminated with UMass' 1998 National Championship.

After the season ended, one would think it was a time to reflect on one's career, and to take time to enjoy one's achievements. On the contrary, Taylor was at work almost immediately, signing with his agent, Steve Calandrino, who has experience with small college players. Former UMass cornerback Kory Blackwell, who is a member of the New York Giants, is also one of Calandrino's clients.

In the months prior to the draft, Taylor had been in the weight room religiously. When he was not there, he was running or catching passes. Several teams contacted Taylor, the 49ers, Patriots, Dolphins, Ravens and Lions, among others. The Dolphins sent one of their top scouts to see how Taylor was progressing. At the end of the workout, Taylor was in good spirits upon learning that the Dolphins were definitely interested and were going to try to get Taylor through the draft or via free agency.

The Ravens also pursued Taylor heavily, sending him letters and calling "more times than I can remember," he said.

The team that expressed the most interest in Taylor was the Detroit Lions, which offered to fly Kerry out to see the facilities and meet with the team physicians. Taylor missed his initial flight, and caught a later flight out to the Motor City.

"I don't know what [position] they coached, but they took us out to dinner and showed us the facilities," Taylor said.

Draft day finally arrived, and Taylor stretched out on his sofa dressed in a UMass football T-shirt and shorts. His mother Donna, stepfather Walter Kelly, and five-year-old brother Blayne buzzed around the house trying not be nervous, but clearly they were.

At 12:09 p.m. Saturday afternoon, the first pick is made as the reincarnated Cleveland Browns select Kentucky quarterback Tim Couch. Taylor knows it's too early for him or am tight end to be picked. A tight end almost never gets picked in the first round.

At 1:35 p.m. Arizona picks David Boston with the eighth pick in the draft. At the same time the phone rings and Taylor answers. It is his father, Peter Osborne on the line. He asks Taylor if there is any word yet. Taylor tells his father, "Not yet, it's to early, you'll be the first to know."

The first round ended and Taylor starts to get a little down on himself. Taylor firmly believes he is one of the best tight ends in the country. This is not conceit, as his accomplishments on the field are valid proof of the talent he possesses.

At 5:40 p.m. Taylor gets a call from his cousin who asks if there is "any good news?" Taylor tells him no.

His cousin responds "Well, keep me posted, you know we are all praying for you." Taylor's bond with his family are best embodied by the relationship with his brother, who always right on his heels. At one point Taylor's 6-foot-2, 255-pound frame was sprawled on the couch with Blayne soundly asleep on his chest.

At 6:13 p.m. It is still early in the second round when the first tight end is picked. Before, Taylor has a chance to react, the phone rings. Before he says hello a chorus of boos from his teammates comes over the line, as they have gathered at his campus house to watch the draft.

"They just called to tell me that he [the first tight end draft pick] sucked, and I was better than he was" Taylor says. The conversation leaves him with a smile on his face.

The first day of the draft is coming to an end and Taylor decides to call Calandrino. They both express surprise at the 'It' taken ahead of him. Taylor expresses his frustration to his agent. Calandrino says "If you think today's hard, tomorrow will be worse."

In the bottom of the first, Brsan Mazzaferro singled to center and Mike Kulak reached first on shortstop Kerrigan's error. Arron Braunstein, who belted three home runs over the weekend, was thrown out on a grounder hit to Kerrigan but earned the RBI as Mazzaferro scored on the play.

The Minutemen were quiet until the fourth when Scott Anderson knocked in Brian Samela. The Owls, on the other hand, scored a run in the second, fourth and fifth inning to bring the totals to 4-2, Temple. The first of Braunstein's solo round-trippers closed the gap to within one at 4-3 after eight innings.

UMass' Craig Szado came on in relief of Loonie and shut out Temple in the top of the ninth to earn the win. With the game on the line, UMass pinch hitter Kevin O'Connell doubled and scored on Nick Gorneault's single to even up the score at 4-4. Temple pitcher Doug Bossert, who went the distance, walked Mazzaferro to move Gorneault to second. Kulak then ripped a streaking single down the first baseline to score Gorneault and clinch the game at 5-4.

"You don't think about it, you just get up and hit," Kulak said about the mounting pressure he faced at bat. "It [the win] puts us in a good shot for the A-10's."

Stone agreed with Kulak. "It almost feels like we stole one from them in the ninth inning."

It was Saturday when the sparks first began to fly as the Minutemen jumped out to a 2-0 lead in the first inning. They tacked on another run in the third before Temple broke its silence with a response of two runs off four costly UMass errors. The Owls scored two more runs in the fifth as Minutemen committed two more errors.

In the bottom of the fifth, Braunstein and Samela lifted back-to-back home runs to recapture the lead, 5-3. Bill Cooke added another win to his belt as the Minutemen won 6-4. Temple's Peter Moore performed triple duty, pitching the duration of the first game, catching the other two while earning at-bats in all three games.

The defense greatly improved for UMass as it soundly spanked Temple 7-1 in the second half. Tempers flared early as Temple coach James "Skip" Williams simmered in the team bus after he questioned a few calls by the umpires. In the top of the fourth, after Kush struck out looking, he and assistant coach Scott Lewis were tossed from the field for expletive language aimed at the umpires.

When play resumed, UMass' Chris Morgan tallied a three- run homer in the fourth for UMass as the derby continued. Travis Veracka hurled all seven innings (5 Ks, 2 walks) for the second weekend in a row.

The Minutemen will host Vermont tomorrow at 3 p.m.

on for the victory.

"By far the best game we played all season. I'm really happy with the way we played. We could blame a variety of factors but we won't, because we have class. It was an outstanding game," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said.

One of the brightest performances for the Minutewomen in the losing effort was made by UMass keeper Jen Nardi, and the Minutewomen defense. Nardi came through with 13 saves on the afternoon, most of which were of the crucial variety late in the game during the free position onslaught.

The UMass defense held the Owls, arguably the best team in the A-10, to a miniscule six-goal output. The lack of Temple goals could signify possibly the defense's best game of the year.

"I think all of our defense played maybe the best defensive game I've seen them play, period," McClellan said.

Offensively the Minutewomen continued to receive some great production from their recent offensive powerhouses. Laura Korutz had two goals against Temple. She would also bury another goal and collect another assist in the second A- 10 game of the weekend against St. Joesph's.

"Offensively, I still think we did some nice things. Our transition game was fantastic against their zone. I don't think we made many mistakes." McClellan said.

Noelle Gorski also netted two more goals in the game against the Owls. The Minutewomen have also been able to count on Melissa Miele a great deal lately as she notched another goal against Temple and two more against St. Joesph's on Sunday, bringing the Drexel Hill, Pa. native's goal tally to 13 on the year.

Rebecca Minaker also collected an assist on Korutz's second goal of the game, which tied the game at 2-2 at that point in the first half. Minaker now has three assists to go along with her nine goals this season.

The Minutewomen will close out their regular season this weekend as they face Duquesne on Friday at 3:30 p.m. and Virginia Tech at 1 p.m. on Sunday, both at Totman Field.

Gretzky leaves NHL legacy behind

The Great One. That isn't a title you can just self-proclaim and have stick. The Edmonton Oilers, St. Louis Blues, Los Angeles Kings and the New York Rangers can all attest to the nickname being well suited to the greatest hockey player who has ever lived.

At age 38, and after 20 years in the NHL, Wayne Gretzky has decided to call it quits. But his stats speak for themselves. He has had a tremendous NHL career and says he is, "leaving on my own terms." Gretzky could play another five years if he wanted to, and would be a productive member of the league and team he plays for.

The NHL will have to start the new millennium without it's all-time leading scorer. Gretzky won four titles with the Edmonton Oilers and was one of the major cogs in the Oilers dynasty in the '80s. He also single-handedly carried the Kings to the Stanley Cup Finals.

Just to show Gretzky's greatness in its most simple terms, here is a time-line of his major accomplishments. In 1979- 1980, he became the youngest player ever to score 50 goals in NHL history. The next year The Great One won his first scoring title with 164 points. The following season he shattered the NHL scoring record, amassing 212 points with 92 goals and 120 assists. In '83-84 he set a record by amassing at least a point in 51 consecutive games.

In '84-85 he won his second Stanley Cup and took home his sixth Hart Trophy while registering his 1,000th career point, after only six years in the league. In '87-88 he became the all-time leader in assists with 1,050 and won his fourth Cup.

On Oct. 15, 1989 he became the NHL's leading goal scorer, and he notched his 2,500th career point in 1994-95.

He finished it all off by surpassing Gordie Howe's overall mark of pro goals with 1,071 goals in 1998-99 season.

The Great One will be sorely missed and the NHL will never see the likes of a Gretzky again.

Azumah's 43-inch vertical leap at the NFL combines, have been rumored to be considering switching the runner to cornerback.

"I've never played the position before, so I'm inexperienced at that," Azumah told The Globe. "At [New Hampshire], I never ran backwards a day in my life, so it's going to be something new, but I'm sure I'll adjust if they need me to."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Khari Samuel

The two rookies will begin their professional careers overshadowed by another Chicago newcomer, however, as the Bears were among five teams to pick high profile quarterbacks with their first round selection. UCLA's Cade McNown was the 12th overall pick in the draft.

The Cleveland Browns decided to put their franchise in the hands of Kentucky's Tim Couch with the No. 1 selection in the event, while the Philadelphia Eagles and the Cincinnati Bengals followed suite with signal-callers Donovan McNabb from Syracuse and Akili Smith from Oregon with the second and third picks, respectively.

Daunte Culpepper of Central Florida was the fourth QB taken, with the 11th overall pick by the Minnesota Vikings.

The shocker of the draft came at Azumah's position of running back, though. With the fourth slot in the opening round of the draft, the Indianapolis Colts set the pro football world on its ear by taking Miami's Edgerrin James to replace the recently traded tailback Marshall Faulk. The Colts, who sent Faulk to St. Louis for a second and a fifth-round pick, decided against the Heisman Trophy winning halfback from Texas, Ricky Williams, who was viewed as a possible overall No. 1 coming into the weekend.

Williams was taken with the next pick by the New Orleans Saints and coach Mike Ditka, who traded all of the rest of their picks this year — including the 12th overall — and next year's first and third rounders to the Redskins for the rights to the No. 5 slot.

The 'Skins, who, like many teams, were very active on Saturday, then traded their recently acquired 12th overall pick to Chicago, who had the seventh pick. Washington pulled the trigger on this deal when the owners of the sixth selection, the Rams, overlooked Georgia "jack-of-all-trades" corner Champ Bailey for North Carolina wide receiver Torry Holt. The Redskins, who entered the draft with only five picks, had been coveting Bailey all along, but could not pass up the early opportunity to grab the Saints' picks.

The New England Patriots were also very active, but with less convincing results. The hometown heroes gave away the 20th selection overall, along with a third and sixth-rounder, to the Seahawks, who had the 17th. With that pick, the Pats grabbed Boston College center Damien Woody, considered by many to be the best in the draft at his position. Woody was sorely needed because of the loss of Dave Wohlabaugh via free agency.

With its next two picks, New England grabbed Ohio State linebacker Andy Katzenmoyer and Louisiana State scatback Kevin Faulk. Katzenmoyer is a physical specimen, but his dedication has been questioned. Faulk was viewed by many NFL insiders as a third-down back and a kick returner in the pros, but the Pats will likely have him competing for a starting spot in the backfield to replace injured running back Robert Edwards.

Cottle will be the first to admit that the collective psyche of his squad is a contributing factor to their current standing.

"Our team approaches games with a sense of invincibility," Cottle said. "For a long time, we were the ones trying to hunt down the big boys, but now everyone is coming after us and they thrive on it."

Despite the overwhelming confidence on the Loyola sidelines, credit was attributed to the solid play of the Minutemen who have responded relatively well to their recent challenges.

"A lot of teams gave up against on this season," Greyhound senior attack Gewas Schindler said. "Our defense caused teams to panic on offense, but UMass never backed down from us."

"Having watched [UMass] play against [No. 2] Duke, I left they were a very competitive and unified team," Cottle said. "I knew we were in for a tough game, and they gave us all we could handle."

There close-knit contests are the types of affairs top ranked teams make their living on, and Loyola has been no different, with naffhiting victories over Syracuse and Johns Hopkins under their belts.

Looking ahead, Cottle foresees a high tide coming in regards to the remaining tasks at hand.

"There is plenty of lacrosse left to be played this season," Cottle said. "We still have Delaware coming up, and as far as I'm concerned they are as good as anyone in the country.

further with a part in two more scores. The senior from Media, Pa. whipped a shot in unassisted less than two minutes after Miele's goal, and fed a point to Rebecca Minaker at the 17:20 mark.

With the scoreboard reading 11-3, the outcome of the game was in hand. Nevertheless, the scoring was far from over.

St. Joe's finally retaliated with a shot from Bernadette Smith after nearly five minutes later.

Ingraffea would nullify that effort with an unassisted goal within the next half of a minute to continue to prove the Minutewoman supremacy.

The Hawks would take advantage of a UMass lull to score three without response. Nora Meash would be followed by two successive goals by Melissa Hieber.

The influx would make little difference in the outcome, however, as Massachusetts Stephanie Pavlick and Kara DePaula alternated scores with SJU's Lisa Chicarelli, who recorded a hat trick on the day.

In goal, Minutewomen Jen Nardi had another solid performance, allowing only three points in nearly 43 minutes of play. Neither of St. Joseph's goaltenders could stop more shots than they let in, as Lauren Bradley and Laura Garrick only made six saves between them.

stepped up and the other guys followed."

UMass had a potent offensive weapon of its own to answer the goal-scoring challenge from Schindler. Sophomore attackman John Madigan scored twice and assisted on another pair of tallies to power the Minutemen.

It was Madigan who opened the afternoon's offense with 14:26 remaining in the first quarter. With a Loyola defender close on his heels, Madigan spun to his left, then right, gaining a step on his defender in the process. With that opportunity, he fired a shot past Greyhound goaltender Jim Brown.

Loyola's Mark Frye, who would finish the day with two goals, evened the score at one with a high shot from 15 yards out. The Greyhounds then grabbed the lead with just over 11 minutes left in the first when T im O'Shea came from around the net on the left and stopped short and fired.

But UMass tied the contest back up with an extra-man goal with 7:06 left in the period. Mike McKeefrey served up a pass from behind the net to Keith Gabrielli, who knocked home a shot from 10 yards out.

In the second quarter, Schindler scored twice but Madigan answered with one goal and fed Don Little with 2:47 left before halftime for another to knot the score at 4-4 heading into the locker room.

The Minutemen were only able to muster one goal in the second half, a hard shot from a leaping Mike Janowicz halfway through the third quarter, and the Greyhounds took over.

Playing a part in that surge was the Loyola defense and its goalie, Brown, who made 15 saves in an effort that stonewalled UMass in the fourth quarter.

"Jim Brown does a nice job in net," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "So much of their success comes from their team defense. They picked off a lot of passes late in the game that had been going through in the first half."

than the two last weekend. Henderson's perfect game was part of a two-win weekend for the squad. The No. 21 Minutewomen improved their conference record to 9-1 with the sweep over the Bonnies.

Henderson's opening game gem was coupled with an eight-run offensive explosion. UMass first baseman Cherra Wheeler blasted her fifth home run of the year in the fifth inning. For the game she went 2-3, and scored twice while driving in three runs.

"[Cherra] is doing a great job at the plate," said Sortino. "She is a tough out. She is an aggressive hitter. She knows what she needs to do. She does not play like a freshman. She gives you great at-bats."

The freshman is quietly beginning her own assault on the UMass record books. She is just three home runs shy of the single season mark of eight set in 1993 by Sherry Kuchinskas.

Offense was again the story in the second game against the Bonnies. The Minutewomen matched their offense production for the first game with another eight runs.

"We had a great day at the plate," said Sortino. "I was really pleased with the adjustments we made between the first and second pitcher because we had to make a huge adjustment, timing wise. Their second pitcher was very slow, but our kids did a really fine job [hitting her]."

Part of that great hitting in game two can be attributed to Nikki Faessler. Faessler hit a home run and a triple to drive in a run and score two more. Becky George was perfect at the plate with a 3-3 performance and two RBI.

Carrie Jeffries collected the win in the second game for UMass, working the complete game and surrendering only four hits. The win improves her season record to 10-3.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You are likely to be contacted today by someone who played an important role in your personal and professional affairs in the past.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — This is not a good time to force yourself on others. You may be feeling rather sullen, and you don't want to spread around any negative feelings.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Good intentions are not enough at this time. You must marry a will to succeed with the effort that can propel you forward at a faster pace.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Focus on combining your efforts with the efforts of neighbors and others around you who share your interest in improving your environment.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You have every right to ask for what you think you deserve at this time, but don't expect to receive it all at once, or even according to your schedule.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Take a look at the "big picture" today and you'll realize that you've been neglecting a certain key issue. There's time today to address it.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — What you are seeking is actually already in your possession, but you're not aware of it just yet. Take time to look around more closely.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You can take advantage of a personal contact today and get ahead without doing anything out of the ordinary. He or she will help you willingly and graciously.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Tact and diplomacy will surely come in handy throughout the day. The best way to deal with criticism of any kind is to remain calm and rational.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Someone may be responding to his or her own demons today, and taking it out on you. You must realize that there is no ill will involved.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Romance beckons today, but your own unusual feelings may be a warning not to take things too quickly. A decision must be made regarding desires.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You should be able to reach an important and valuable compromise today with someone who has been on the other side of an argument for some time.

Softball wins 2, faces UC

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

Anyone who knows what a perfect game is knows how rare they are. For a perfect game a pitcher must get every opponent out and not let a single runner on base, surrender no walks, no errors and no hits. Such an athletic feat is one of the marvels of the sports world.

Massachusetts softball pitcher Danielle Henderson recorded a perfect game on Sunday against St. Bonaventure, an 8-0 UMass win. Even more amazing is the fact that it is her second perfect game of the season and the third of her illustrious UMass career.

In addition to notching another perfect game, Henderson struck out 14 batters, bringing her career total to 1,168 Ks. That total moves her into fifth place for career strikeouts in NCAA history.

Despite the success and the records Henderson continues to challenge herself to pitch better.

"I thought she pitched well," said UMass coach Elaine Sortino. "It wasn't her greatest effort. She moved the ball around well. I feel that this last part of the season she definitely will have greater challenges, and she knows it.

"That's why I am very pleased that she has not been satisfied. Even yesterday she threw a perfect game and she wasn't very pleased with the way she threw."

Sortino knows that the St. Bonaventure team is not of the same caliber as today's opponent, Connecticut (3 p.m. in Storrs, Conn.), and that she will need her ace to throw her best stuff. UMass won the first two outings this year against the Huskies on neutral sites, but the first 8-0 win was much more convincing than the 2-0 victory last month.

"Tomorrow will be closer yet," Sortino warned yesterday. "That's the kind of team Connecticut is. They are a good team. They are one of the best teams in the region, ranked fourth in the region. UConn–UMass [has been a] great rivalry over the years. We are going there. I think it is going to be very tough."

Today's two contests should prove more challenging

Baseball captures three to grab A–10 East lead

Advancing three giant leaps, the Massachusetts baseball team (17–12, 7–2 Atlantic 10) downed Temple (15–19–1, 4–5 A–10) this weekend at Earl Lorden Field to take sole possession of the A–10 East.

Prior to the three–game series, the Minutemen and Owls were tied for bragging rights in the East with both squads at a standstill within the conference at 4–2.

"Everybody contributed, including those off the bench... we stayed with it and took advantage of early opportunities," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

After swiping both halves of the double–dipper on Saturday, Sunday proved to be the only opportunity left for Temple to retaliate. Both teams notched a run in the first as the Owl's Bob Filler walked and reached second after David Loonie balked. Joe Kerrigan smashed a double to move Filler to third. Right–fielder Andrew Kush then hit a sacrifice fly to left field to bring around Filler.

No. 1 Loyola slips through UMass' grasp

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Gewan Schindler knows there is a bull's eye on his back. There's also one on Mark Frye, Tim O'Shea, Todd Vizcarrondo, Jim Brown and every other member of the top–ranked and undefeated Loyola men's lacrosse team.

The Greyhounds, therefore, are accustomed to challenges to their unblemished mark. Saturday, a week after holding Syracuse to only eight goals, they thwarted a upset–minded Massachusetts team, 9–5, at Richard F. Garber Field.

The Minutemen (3–6) gave Loyola (7–0) a run for its money, taking a deadlock halfway into the third quarter. But the Greyhounds — led by Schindler's four goals — ran off four unanswered tallies late in the game to secure the win.

"At that point the seniors looked at each other and said that we would control our season," Schindler said. "We didn't want to let down, so we would not lose a step defensively or on the offensive end.

With just over 23 minutes remaining, UMass continued its offensive attack and finally notched the go–ahead goal when Noelle Gorski put one past Temple (5–7, 4–0 Atlantic 10) netminder Iris Alvarado to give the Minutewomen a 5–4 edge with 17:19 remaining.

Despite having the lead, the Minutewomen didn't let up as they had done in the past. However, this time it was the officiating that did the Minutewomen in. In the final 17 minutes of the game, the Owls received seven free positions to UMass' three despite the fact that both teams were playing a physical game on the defensive end.

The Owls took advantage of one of their many free positions and scored when Jessica McClay buried her free position with 5:06 remaining to tie the rain–plagued game.

The Minutewomen would later fall on a goal by Temple's Nicole Ross, who tallied her third of the game with 1:23 remaining. Despite a huge offensive onslaught in the last minute by Massachusetts, Temple was able to hold

Samuel goes to Chicago in big QB draft

JOSEPH D. SAVITCH / COLLEGIAN

Kentucky quarterback Tim Couch was the first pick in this weekend's National Football League draft.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

NEW YORK — After dominating the greens of Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium for four glorious years, Massachusetts linebacker Khari Samuel will try out a new playing surface: the Chicago Bears' Soldier Field.

Samuel, fresh off of a national championship season with UMass, was selected with the 144th pick in the National Football League draft this weekend.

The 6–foot–2, 242–pound linebacker, who finished his career with 10 tackles against Georgia Southern in the Division I–AA national title game, will now have a chance to continue his legacy at the next level — at a place where linebackers have quite a legacy.

The Minuteman will be fortunate enough to be playing under the tall shadows of NFL greats Mike Singletary and Dick Butkis while in Chicago, an honor very few at his position can boast.

"... that's another reason why I like the situation," Samuel told The Boston Globe in a story that ran yesterday. "I'm proud to be able to go there and experience that [legacy]. I'm really, really excited."

The Framingham native, like most rookies, will have the odds stacked against him, but that will not deter the man with over 300 tackles in his collegiate career.

"Just knowing Khari from the one season I played with him, he's always worked hard and has been very competitive," UMass quarterback Todd Bankhead said. "It's hard for anyone to go from college to the pros, but he'll work hard and I'm sure he'll do well."

Samuel will not be lonely in training camp, however, as the Bears also selected New Hampshire tailback Jerry Azumah with the 147th pick. Azumah was a thorn in the Minutemen's side for four years, eventually setting several career Division I–AA rushing records. The Wildcat, who won the Walter Payton Award as the nation's premiere Division I–AA player, might even join Samuel on the defensive side of the ball.

The Bears, who were among many pro teams impressed by PHILADELPHIA — The Massachusetts (6–5, 1–1 A–10) women's lacrosse team survived the monsoon conditions and a long delay in the game due to a lightning storm, but could not survive the officiating that went along with it in a game in Philadalphia where it lost with 1:23 remaining to Temple, 6–5.

Temple	6
Massachusetts	5

The Minutewomen returned to the field after the lightning delay with the score notched at 4–4, and would not lose a step defensively or on the offensive end.

With just over 23 minutes remaining, UMass continued its offensive attack and finally notched the go–ahead goal when Noelle Gorski put one past Temple (5–7, 4–0 Atlantic 10) netminder Iris Alvarado to give the Minutewomen a 5–4 edge with 17:19 remaining.

Despite having the lead, the Minutewomen didn't let up as they had done in the past. However, this time it was the officiating that did the Minutewomen in. In the final 17 minutes of the game, the Owls received seven free positions to UMass' three despite the fact that both teams were playing a physical game on the defensive end.

The Owls took advantage of one of their many free positions and scored when Jessica McClay buried her free position with 5:06 remaining to tie the rain–plagued game.

The Minutewomen would later fall on a goal by Temple's Nicole Ross, who tallied her third of the game with 1:23 remaining. Despite a huge offensive onslaught in the last minute by Massachusetts, Temple was able to hold

PHILADELPHIA, Pa. — After losing a 6–5 decision at Temple on Friday, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team rebounded strong by whacking St. Joseph's 14–9 on the Hawks' Finnesey Field Sunday.

In the opening half, the Minutewomen (7–5, 2–1 Atlantic 10) frustrated St. Joe's (3–8, 1–3 A–10) by responding with three unanswered goals when the Hawks pulled within one early.

UMass exploded into a three–point lead after juniors Noelle Gorski and Melissa Miele, and senior co–captain Melissa Anderson fired in one goal apiece.

The score was 3–2 before the Minutewomen got back on the board when junior Sara MacNabb redirected a pass from senior co–captain Laura Korutz into the net. Anderson then went the same route with a Rachel Ingraffea toss before the MacNabb–Korutz combo struck again to up the score to 6–2.

Gorski notched her second of the afternoon 29 seconds after the Hawks' Ashley Moltz did the same to bring the SIU score to three.

The second half began in much the same way the first half did. Gorski finished off a hat trick and Miele scored her second to make the numbers read 9–2 in favor of UMass. Ingraffea picked up her second assist on Miele's tally.

Korutz then went on a spurt to bury the Hawks even Loyola receives fight

Minutemen don't back down

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team played the role of headhunters to a tee on Saturday afternoon, but in the end they were painfully reminded why Loyola was ranked No. 1 in the nation.

For three quarters, the 3–6 Minutemen played neck and neck with the best in the business, trailing 6–5 entering the final frame.

Unfortunately for the game UMass squad, the Greyhounds put the clamps down, led by goalkeeper Jim Brown, who guided a fourth–quarter shutout while the offense added three insurance goals.

While the Loyola offense was better than adequate, it was its play on the opposite end of the field that led to the demise of the Minutemen on this day.

"Coming into the year, everyone said we would not win any faceoffs and our defense would be terrible," Loyola coach Dave Cottle said. "It is a credit to our team that the defense is now one of the best in the country."

While UMass did win the battle on faceoffs 11–7, it could not overcome the swarming Greyhound defense that dogged it all afternoon.

"Jim Brown (15 saves) does a nice job in net," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said. "So much of their success comes from their team defense. They picked off a lot of passes late in the game that had been going through in the first half."

Dating back to an early 12–6 loss to North Carolina last season, the Greyhounds (7–0) have now amassed a 19–game winning streak boosting the team's confidence to newfound

DePina cleared for move

Sophomore guard Jonathan DePina has become the second backcourt member of the Massachusetts basketball team to request a release for transfer in the past two weeks.

According to the weekend edition of the Daily Hampshire Gazette, DePina was released from his scholarship at the end of last week, but could return to UMass if his situation does not work out.

Rumors of a possible DePina transfer surfaced at many points during the 1998–99 campaign. The South Boston native endured an unproductive season, and on numerous occasions lost his job as back–up point guard to Rafael Cruz, whom coach Bruiser Flint also released for transfer over a week ago. Unlike DePina, however, Cruz did not leave the door open for a possible return to the Minutemen.

In 10.4 minutes per contest, DePina averaged 1.8 points and 1.3 assists. He also started the final game of the 1998– 99 season for UMass, which was playing without injured captain Charlton Clarke. Transfer Shannon Crooks is expected to fill Clarke's spot next season and limit DePina's playing time. In addition, Flint has been open about his intent to heavily recruit new guards.

Among the possible options for DePina are two smaller Division I programs, Northeastern and Boston University. Although highly unlikely, DePina may have a small chance of drawing interest from 1999 Final Four participant Ohio State. Buckeye coach Jim O'Brien, who left Boston College two seasons ago, heavily recruited DePina while with the Eagles. O'Brien's top guard and 1998–99 Big 10 Player of the Year Scoonie Penn may yet enter the 1999 NBA draft, and open a scholarship.

Decisions finalized for Spring Concert

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

After months of work and numerous uncertainties, this year's Spring Concert has finally been firmed up by the Student Government Association and University Productions and Concerts. The show will be on May 8 at 3 p.m. in the William D. Mullins Center.

There will be two stages set up, one which will be for the four main acts and the other for four smaller acts. The line– up for the Spring Concert is as follows, the winner of the Battle of the Bands (which will take place during Southwest Week, April 26–30) will perform first, followed by Strangefolk.

A University of Massachusetts alum will take the stage next, as the lead singer of band Socks Malone. According to ex–Secretary of University Policy Avi Khanna, the band "has the flavor of Ani DeFranco."

Lisa Cook, speaker of the senate and an organizer of Spring Conert said of the act — "We were looking for talented women's acts and we thought it was a great idea to have a UMass alum."

After Socks Malone, KRS–1 will take center stage. Then Big Bad Bollocks will play as an opening act to The Mighty Mighty Bosstones.

Breaking up the bands for a while will be a DJ battle until Cypress Hill takes the stage and finishes up the show.

The students involved in planning the Spring Concert this year say they did the best they could with the budget. "This year one of our priorities was to insure that students got a free Spring Concert. In years past students have had to pay. The talent is good, and it's free so everyone can enjoy it," said Cook.

According to Andrew Mashlin, UPC talent coordinator, "This will be the best concert this campus has seen since at least since '95, overall the line up is bigger then in '95."

"Getting big acts was difficult," said Khanna. "We wanted to please everyone and that's almost impossible, but we have an array of music, it goes from hip hop to ska, etc. Criticism is something that's really easy for people to do but it is hard for people to understand how hard it is to get talent that satisfies the majority of students on campus," said Khanna.

"It's also hard on a limited budget to attract mega super stars. People don't realize how expensive talent is, we did our best and we are satisfied with the talent we attracted," said Cook.

SGA said this year's Spring Concert budget was $100,000 and major artists like Lauryn Hill go for a minimum of $150,000 and Mariah Carey costs between one to three million. If major artists like this were brought to campus it would have meant a one–act Spring Concert.

"We spent every last cent possible and even though UPC had nothing to do with the change of venue [Mullins Center] will make for a better concert. It leaves no chance for cancellation, zero... We have really diverse artists coming, something for people who are into mainstream music and people who are into really specific music," said Mushlin.

Undergraduates need to bring a valid student ID to gain admission and there will be 1,000 tickets put on sale for the cost of $17.50 for non–undergraduate UMass students.

NATO plans day attacks on Kosovo

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — NATO launched daylight attacks yesterday in Pristina and other parts of Kosovo while accusing Serb forces of flushing out ethnic Albanians hiding in the province's hills.

U.S. helicopters and troops were headed toward Albania in a new phase aimed at boosting the alliance's ability to attack Yugoslav ground forces and stop their campaign to rid Kosovo of its ethnic Albanian majority.

NATO spokesman Jamie Shea said Serb military and paramilitary forces were shelling hills where ethnic Albanians had fled, marching the refugees on roads and putting them on trains to the border, then closing the frontier to them.

"What we are seeing as we study these movements of people is a kind of safari operation ongoing by the Serb security forces against the Kosovar Albanians," Shea said.

He told reporters at NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium, that the alliance was investigating reports of 700 ethnic Albanian boys as young as 14 being used either as "human shields or as blood banks for Serb casualties."

Refugees also said as many as 700 men were used as human shields last week near the town of Orahovac. There was no independent confirmation of the report.

The accusations came as the alliance continued its four–week assault on Yugoslavia, hammering targets in a dozen towns and cities.

In Kosovo, the private Yugoslav news agency FoNet said one person was killed and two injured in a daylight attack on a government building in the provincial capital, Pristina. Missiles also struck the city airport, FuNet said.

NATO planes bombed targets near Kosovo's Belacevac coalmine at least four times yesterday, the state–run Tanjug news agency said. The mine supplies coal for a Pristina power station that gives Kosovo most of its electricity.

Fighting was also reported in Kosovo between ethnic Albanian rebels and Serb forces.

The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said 15 wounded Kosovo Liberation Army fighters were brought to a hospital yesterday in the Albanian border town Bajram Curri, along with the bodies of two rebels killed during fighting.

Also yesterday, an Albanian soldier was wounded in a seven–hour exchange of machine–gun and sniper fire across the Yugoslav–Albanian border south of the Kosovo city Djakovica, the OSCE reported.

It was the first reported clash between Albanian and Yugoslav forces since the NATO bombing campaign began March 24.

NATO also cited a series of "disturbing developments," including reports "too numerous" to ignore of Serb soldiers raping ethnic Albanian women, using tear gas to move ethnic Albanians out of homes in Pristina and "mixing" into civilian convoys, in addition to continuing reports of executions and mass burials.

"It's extremely depressing that human beings are used as pawns on this type of macabre and rather Machiavellian chess board," Shea said.

Ethnic Albanians once made up 90 percent of Kosovo's two million people, and Yugoslav forces have expelled an estimated 640,000 of them from the province since last month. Many ethnic Albanians favor Independence for Kosovo, a province of Serbia, Yugoslavia's dominant republic.

Despite the grim reports and resistance by Serb forces, NATO and its 19 allies intend "to see this through to the end, no matter how long it takes... until President (Slobodan) Milosevic backs down," Shea said at the briefing.

Petition coming for new garage

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Throwing a wrench in the works of an approved parking garage plan, a petition will be brought before Town Meeting to choose a different design.

"This is not the 11th hour this is the morning after," said Bryan Harvey, Select Board chairperson.

Peter Kitchell, a member of the Parking Garage Building Committee, brought the petition before the Board seeking their support for it during the annual legislative Town Meeting, beginning April 28.

The Board discussed the petition but did not take a stand on it last night, tabling the matter for a future meeting.

The petition calls for Town Meeting to approve a new parking garage plan which includes a plaza in the middle of it. This would mean throwing out the original garage plan, that does not have a plaza. The Committee took a year–and–a–half to create the original plan and unanimously approved it, which included a positive vote from Kitchell.

He said influences like group mentality made him vote with the Committee for the plan he is now looking to throw out with his petition.

"A committee can be wrong," he said.

Kitchell's plan, he said, would not change anything structurally that the Committee agreed upon, just superficially. He said that the plaza could be added and not change the cost of the garage.

"The critical number of cars, and the dollars are the same in both plans," Kitchell said.

But Select Board member and Parking Garage Building Committee member Carl Seppala, disagreed.

"There's a lot of things in this plan we clearly cannot afford," Seppala said.

The cost of the garage was mandated by Town Meeting a year–and–a–half–ago for $4 million. The Committee struggled to meet the mark, ending up with a proposal for this Town Meeting for a parking garage that would cost $4.3 million.

Seppala said if Town Meeting adopted the new plan it would cost more money regardless, because funds already spent on architects and other professionals to approve the first plan, would be lost. Also, new money would have to be spent on those individuals for them to look at the new plan.

Board member Hill Boss said approving a new plan would go against the will of the majority because Town Meeting did not approve the parking garage to have a plaza. Kitchell had brought the design with the plaza before Town Meeting a year–and–a–half ago but it was voted down in favor of developing a plan without a plaza.

"But to at this late minute offer an alternative which differs so much from the decision of the majority is something I have a problem with," Boss said.

Seppala also said changing plans now would cause costly delays in the garage's construction. He said there is a time when Amherst can get "the most bang for its buck" and that "window of opportunity" would be missed with delays.

"I've decided Town Meeting is the best judge of this whole thing," Kitchell said.

But Harvey said since it may be hard to pass the $4.3 million plan with Town Meeting because it is over $4 million, it would be "reckless" to approve a new plan that may not fit the budget.

However, Kitchell still argued that the two plans would cost the same because they are structurally the same.

Two men open fire on Colorado high school

By Robert Weller
Associated Press

LITTLETON, Colo. — Two young men in fatigues and black trench coats attacked students with guns and explosives in a suicide mission at a suburban Denver high school yesterday, and the sheriff said 25 people may have been killed. The gunmen were found dead in the library.

Several students said the killers — believed to be former students at Columbine High School — were gunning for minorities and athletes.

The gunmen were found dead with devices on them that authorities said could be bombs.

"It appears to be a suicide mission," Sheriff John Stone said. At least 20 people were wounded at the 11:30 a.m. attack. Shots ricocheted off lockers as the gunmen opened fire with what students said were automatic weapons. One girl was shot nine times in the chest.

"At first we thought it was fireworks, then we saw them shooting," said Jake Apoeaca, 16. "He saw us and then he started shooting at us. Then a guy in a white T–shirt threw two hand grenades on the roof. We hit the ground and then we started running."

Many students dived to the floors and sprinted for the exits. Dozens of students hid in classrooms before escaping with the help of police in an armored car. Others were trapped for hours while SWAT teams searched for the gunmen.

At one point, a bloodied young man dangled from a second–floor window, his right arm limp and was helped down by two SWAT team members. His condition was not immediately known.

The sheriff said 25 people may have been killed, students and teachers alike. But by early evening, officers had yet to remove any bodies because of the danger of explosives and the need to preserve evidence. FBI agents and police SWAT teams slowly made their way through the building.

A third young man was led away from the school in handcuffs more than four hours after the attack. Sheriff's spokesman Steve Davis said that suspect was believed to be a friend of the gunmen but did not take part in the attack.

Wes Lammers, 17, was among several students who said the gunmen were targeting minorities and athletes at the 1,800–student high school.

Other students said the killers might have been part of a group of eight to 10 students who wear black trench coats every day and are known as the "Trench Coat Mafia."

"They are jerks," said Jason Greer, 16. "They are really strange, but I've never seen them do anything violent."

For hours after the attack, wounded victims lay inside the building and police were unable to get to them.

Outside, hundreds of officers from throughout the Denver area surrounded the school. Frantic parents were sent to a nearby elementary school, where they searched for word of their children. Some students had called their parents on cellular phones from inside the building.

Teenagers hugged parents and each other and wept and they recalled the shootings.

As TV images of the scene were broadcast nationwide, helicopter ambulances used a sports field as a landing pad, and officers in helmets and camouflage gear took cover behind squad cars. Students who fled the building wept and held their hands above their heads

Over his four years at the University of Massachusetts, senior natural resource studies major Stuart Newman has played a large role in student affairs.

To begin with, anyone who has ever needed a question answered over the summer can pay some thanks to Stuart. Acting as a coordinator, Stuart is in charge of hiring operators for the summer Dean of Student's "Help Hotline." Stuart says the hotline, used mainly by new students, is directed towards answering questions about housing assignments, financial aid packages, and other information in regards to the Bursars and Registrar's Office.

Applicants for the position go through one week of training in all administrative business and financial areas. During this time, Stuart says he looks for applicants who would be helpful in answering administrative questions to students regarding tuition bills, finances, and class schedules.

"We listen to what our first impression would be and how knowledgeable they are of the helpline," Stuart said. "We also ask if they could help somebody how would they do it. We want to be sure they would be helpful to callers who need to find information."

In addition to this interviewing process, Stuart says he acts as a back up to Dean of Students, Paul Vasconcellos, in doing so, Stuart helps in overlooking problems and University judicial court hearings.

"You learn a lot about what student's concerns are," Stuart said. "They come here with numerous problems and the Deans try their best to help them out, and they do a pretty good job."

On numerous occasions, Stuart has dealt with incidents involving family deaths, sicknesses, and harassment. On a smaller scale, he has helped organize an annual Dean of Students and Student Affairs luncheon in which approximately 600 staff members participated.

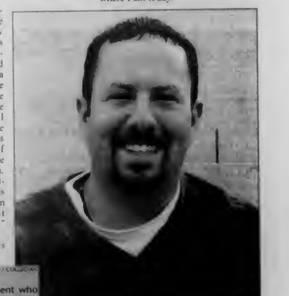
"Basically working in an office like this is the best real world experience," Stuart said. "It's not sitting in a classroom, it's what my future will probably be like."

Through the internship department, Stuart is receiving 12 credits for his work, which adds up close to 30 hours per week.

Substance-related partying has become an apparent problem according to Stuart who has noticed an increase in judicial hearings in regards to alcohol violations. This problem has caused Stuart to take action by joining the Amherst Problem Solving Partnership, an organization which addresses issues and concerns surrounding drinking. The partnership works in cooperation with the town of Amherst, UMass and the surrounding police forces to develop solutions to alcohol-related problems.

Stuart feels a large part of the surrounding Amherst community disagrees with students' rights to party and he feels Vasconcellos has played a large role in putting the student's rights foremost.

"He [Vasconcellos] looks out for the student's well-being," Stuart said. "If it was up to the town, there would be no parties. It would be a dry campus."



Stuart says his participation in the Problem Solving Partnership has increased his interaction with the Dean of Students, University students and the UMass and Amherst Police Departments.

After graduating in May, the Ocean, New Jersey native says he will be returning home and hopes to find a job with the national or state government. The environmental policy for the state and nation is one concern of Stuart's which he wants to work on.

"The best feeling in the world is helping a person in the greatest time of need," Stuart said.

Stuart jokes about almost being thrown out of nursery school, but his energy, enthusiasm and friendship have helped him rise to the level he is at.

"Friendship taught me everything," Stuart said. "If it weren't for my friends and family, I wouldn't be where I am today."

Brutality of Serb forces recorded by eyewitnesses

By Laura King
Associated Press

BRAZDA, Macedonia — Sitting cross-legged in a canvas tent in a refugee camp overflowing with Kosovo Albanians, Beshet Ahmeti is embarking on what may become a lifelong crusade: bringing to justice the Serb paramilitary men he says executed fellow villagers before his eyes.

By the side of a rural road, the militiamen forced four Kosovo Albanians to lie in the dirt and wordlessly machine-gunned them, Ahmeti said.

A fifth man, ordered to set the bodies on fire, was forced to lie atop the bloody corpses and was riddled with bullets after he refused in horror.

"He said to them, 'But I can't make a fire. I don't have matches,'" Ahmeti, a high school history teacher, recounted Monday.

"And then you could see the awful look on his face, that he realized he was asking these men how he should burn the bodies of his friends."

After the killings, Ahmeti and another witness — both already in the paramilitary's custody — were taken to the group's headquarters in a nearby village, where he says their captors stripped and taunted them, and carved Serb crosses on their chests. They put a bloody knife in his mouth, Ahmeti said, and threatened to stick it out the back of his head.

Told to keep silent, Ahmeti is instead determined to bear witness.

He wants to make sure his account of what happened on that sunny afternoon on April 4 becomes part of the annals of international war crimes testimony, even if it takes years.

"I'll tell it 10,000 times if I have to," said the 32-year-old schoolteacher. "I'll tell it looking those men right in the face. I don't believe that in this world such things can go unpunished." Documenting war's atrocities can be daunting. Those who witnessed such events may have no wish to relive them.

Investigators may be hamstrung by jumbled accounts, witnesses who can't be traced, memories made unreliable by shock and terror, little by little, the unspeakable can become the undocumentable. An avid student of history, Ahmeti knows all this.

Polygamy lifestyle examined in case of fleeing daughter

By Hannah Wolfson
Associated Press

LOGAN, Utah.— A man accused of beating his daughter after she ran away from an arranged marriage to his brother goes on trial today in a case that is raising questions about Utah polygamy. John Daniel Kingston, 43, is charged with felony child abuse for allegedly beating his 16-year-old daughter.

The girl, now living in foster care, says her father drove her to a family owned farm near the Idaho line in May and whipped her for disobeying Daniel Ortell Kingston, who had made her his 15th wife.

But to many, the real defendant in the case is not the father, but a way of life in Utah that has survived in the shadows for more than a century.

Though polygamy is banned by the state constitution and denounced by the Mormon church, the attorney general's office estimates there are 25,000 practitioners in Utah alone.

And though lawyers for both sides say the trial is not about polygamy, the Kingston clan is one of the most prominent polygamous groups in Utah, and the issues have become inseparable.

"(Polygamy) is the very reason this whole thing is coming down," said Owen Allred, the leader of a separate polygamous clan based in Bluffdale.

"Generally speaking, our people are very peaceful, mind-your-own-business people," Allred said in a telephone interview. But right now, he said, he feels like his way of life is on trial.

No large-scale bigamy cases have been prosecuted since the 1950s, when agents raided the town of Short Creek on the Utah-Arizona line. The incident backfired when the public, enraged by images of families being torn apart, protested and the state backed off.

Anti-polygamy groups say prosecutors should attack once more. They say the brothers should face bigamy as well the other charges — child abuse against John Kingston and incest charges against Daniel Kingston, who is to be tried in June.

"They're really missing the boat on this one," said Carmen Thompson, executive director of the advocacy group Tapestry of Polygamy, comprised of former polygamous wives. "When you see crimes stemming directly from the polygamy issue, the polygamy should be prosecuted."

The clan led by patriarch Merlin Kingston goes by the name of the "Latter-day Church of Christ, Kingston Co-op Group" and has about 1,000 members. The brothers are the sons of the clan's leader, who died in 1987.

Though not the largest polygamous group, the Kingstons are the most affluent, with assets estimated around $150 million.

When the issue exploded with charges filed against the Kingston last year, Gov. Mike Leavitt — the great-grandson of polygamists — said he thought the practice might be protected by the First Amendment. He soon backed away from that idea.

UMass Dental Services 577-5400

The UMass Dental Services is located on the ground floor of the UMass Health Services Building. The Dental Services has been offering dental care since its establishment in 1974. A wide variety of services are available, such as, Dental Fillings, Wisdom Tooth Consultation, Dental Cleanings, Children's Dentistry, and Cosmetic Dentistry.

We offer services to U Mass students, faculty, and staff. A 10% discount is given if payment is recieved the same day dental services are rendered. An additional 10% discount on preventative services is offered to U Mass students who carry the U Mass Basic or Supplimental Insurance Coverage. Please feel free to visit our practice, we welcome your smile!

Dr. Preetmohinder Bagga is Acting Director of the UMass Dental Services. Dr. Bagga holds a Dental Degree from Boston University School of Dental Medicine. In addition, he holds a Dental Degree from India and residency experience from AIIMS, Premiere Medical Institue of India. Dr. Bagga has extensive experience in all aspects of Dentistry, such as, Restorative, Endodontics and Oral Surgery. His gentle, caring rapport with patients which is an asset to the Dental Service. Outside of the office, he enjoys cooking , playing cricket and is taking up golf.

Dr. Grace M. Collura is the most recent member to join UHS Dental Services in Nov. of 1998. Dr.Collura has 12 years of extensive experience with all phases of Cosmetic Dentistry including all Ceramic Crowns, Porcelain Veneers, Tooth Colored Fillings and Bleaching Techniques. She is also quite adept with the most up to date Oral Surgery Procedures, including surgical extractions. She graduated from Boston College with a B.S. in 1982 and from Tufts University School of Dental Medicine with a D.M.D. in 1986. When not practicing Dentistry, she fine tunes her keene sense of humor by playing golf, traveling, attending continuing education courses and skiing with her 9 year old son, Frank.

Dr. Leonard Talevi has been on the UHS Dental Staff since Nov. of 1998. He has maintained a private General Dentistry practice in Springfield, MA since 1979. He recieved his Dental Degree from Boston University, where he also received his B.A. and post-graduate degrees in Microbiology. His hospital residency training was in Oral Medicine with specialty in the treatment of the medically compromised patient. Dr. Talevi is interested in all phases of Dentistry, but particularly enjoys working with the "phobic" dental patient. He finds that real and/or perceived fears about Dental treatment represent the greatest challenge to Dentistry today. A holistic approach to Dentistry is an essential part of Dr. Talevi's treatment philosophy. Dr. Talevi is married with three teenage children, theoldest of whom is a Freshman at Boston University.

Who's unsophisticated?

I hate those universities that think they are better than everyone else. You know those places like Smith, Harvard, Amherst, Virginia, etc.? People at those schools give you so much attitude for attending a state school that I hate them too.

You can go take your pretentious attitude and shove it. You can go take your $30,000 plus a year tuition and shove it too. Who is smarter now, the kid at the school with a name or the kid who paid $20,000 less and received a comparable education? "It's a no brainer where you are going to go," says Rick Pitino from the Celtics in those UMass commercials.

Well you know what, I am sick of people putting down this university. If you do not attend this school, how can you dare insult our quality of education? Who is to say that your school is any better than mine? Education is, in a large part, what you make of it. I am also sick of people who go here that put down this university.

Matt Frascella

As armadas of high school seniors and their parents visit the school for their final look before deciding on their future school, some extra consideration is in order.

Other schools may receive reputations and get countless applications just for a name. I think name recognition is one of the dumbest things going. A name is just that, a name. It has no substance. Apparently something has been lost in today's society. We all race around for what everyone else thinks is the best. Just because some book or magazine says Eclectic U is great, we all want to go there. Who knows how much money they paid the magazine to get that ranking and who knows if it is right for you.

Sure, I normally spend my allotted space complaining about stupid things like the grounds and the chancellor, but this time I mean business. This school is not perfect by any means, but UMass is the real world.

It is not some overpriced fairy land where kids are brainwashed into thinking that they are the best little lads in all the nation. If you don't think that this is true consider this: Stanford University no longer takes applications from Harvard University seriously for medical school because the kids are so arrogant that they were detracting from the program.

There is no way in hell that I would pay all that money to be arrogant. I can do that on my own. Apparently some members of the Five College community at so-called "high brow" universities see it as their duty to continually ridicule Massachusetts just to make themselves seem better. I personally was attacked and labeled as unsophisticated and not cultured.

I got that pretentious impression while attending the UMass–Lehigh football game this last fall. Some Lehigh fans were drunk after tailgating (there's some kicking culture, breaking university policy and being intoxicated) and they started chanting "safety school." I was so angry at their ostentatious attitude that I was ecstatic when Mark Whipple and the boys kicked their private school asses right back to the Keystone State. How does it feel now to know your undefeated season was ruined by a "plebeian" university?

Sometimes I will merely sense that same attitude of superiority as I walk through downtown Amherst. I am innocently purchasing a Snoop Doggy Dog CD when I am conscientiously made to feel inferior because I have a University of Massachusetts sticker on my car. So what if Chelsea Clinton looked at your school, that doesn't mean you are better than UMass.

If anything, your childish attempts at putting me down make me even prouder to go to UMass. I didn't want arrogance in a school. I looked at Yale and walked around and almost vomited from the snobby attitude that permeated the entire city. I decided not to waste my $50 application fee and didn't even bother to send them my application.

Apparently since I decided to come here over some schools with better reputations, though, that makes me unsophisticated. If so, then tell that to Bill Cosby, Rick Pitino, Natalie Cole, Richard Gere, Bill Pullman, and John Smith: CEO of General Motors, Jack Welch: CEO of General Electric, William Savel: CEO of Baskin Robbins, Robert Mahoney CEO: of Citizens Bank Boston, and George Ditomassi: CEO of Hasbro/Milton Bradley. Do I have to continue or have I made my point? Tell those people they lack sophistication. It doesn't seem to me that UMass grads are doing so bad for themselves.

Or maybe you should criticize our marching band — they only received the 1998 Louis C. Sudler Trophy for being the most outstanding marching band in the nation.

I'm proud to go to school here. I don't buy into that garbage about not being capable because UMass grads are certainly capable. The record clearly shows that. I am proud of the teachers that I have had the privilege to study under. It is time for an attitude change at this school. I am including both students and faculty in that assessment. Let's all be proud of where we go to school and the good things that are happening at this university.

If you write me off for what school I go to then you hardly have the right to call me unsophisticated; you should look in the mirror because you are the one who is being petty, and you should watch out because one day this uncultured kid from the public school of UMass may just be your boss.

Health care for all

In 1994, the world was different. Oh, yes, we had the Internet, made-for-TV movies and grape gum, but think where we were: O.J. Simpson's bloody glove preoccupied us; we still listened to Pearl Jam; we weren't facing the end of the world as we know it.

At that point in time we were also in the throes of the health care reform debate. Hillary Clinton, mounted on her fine steed and sporting the latest in medieval armor charged about the battle field, her sword catching — briefly — the brilliance of the sun while members of Congress parried with ineffectual epees in the grass below. At the end of the glorious battle, the American people had nothing more than an empty field and special interest groups were out more than 100 million dollars.

Alexis Pushkar

Why did people think we needed a national health care system? For one thing, 15 percent of the people in the United States (more than 40 million people) lack medical insurance. Although many in this country tout the wonders of modern America, the sad fact is that the rising tide is not carrying all the boats: poor people in America are the least likely to have medical insurance.

But it's not just the impoverished who lack medical insurance and thus access to regular health care. Any American who is out of work or who is working part-time most likely is not covered. By law, hospitals must take care of patients whether or not they have the ability to pay, but while emergency room dramas make great television, ERs are not the best way to take care of people's health. Consistent preventative medical care works the best in terms of keeping people healthy.

In addition, preventative care is generally cheaper than emergency care. Emergency rooms are expensive to operate. Therefore, the people who foot the bill for the medical care of the uninsured are the people who can afford to pay like Joe Schmoe, Jane Doe and John Smith. Basically having a large number of uninsured people creates waste in society to say nothing of the needless human suffering.

Why do Americans allow this state of affairs to continue? Part of the answer lies in the fact that since poor people are the most affected and they have very little say in the running of the country, they are easy to sweep under the rug.

Another part of the answer is a bit more mysterious. It involves all that rugged individualism stuff that forged a new nation from the sweat and tears of the dispossessed. Many Americans want to prevent the national government from having too much power and control over all facets of their lives. Given the general inefficiency of lawmakers in Washington, this idea is not without merit.

Whether this predisposition to a weak central government is inherited through some kind of rebel gene passed down by our bold ancestors or whether it is inherited through some kind of cultural genetics, the fact remains that America's fear of a centralized medical system was never realized. The issue died then and there in the mid–90s.

Oddly enough, Americans are dissatisfied with the current system. In a 1990 survey conducted by Harvard School of Public Health, Americans felt fundamental changes were needed. Out of the 10 countries surveyed, Americans were among the least satisfied with their health system. The Canadians, however, were pretty well satisfied. Go figure. We should all move to Canada.

The contentious Americans are divided by three choices: national health insurance, reform of private insurance or managed competition. Since Congress has never been of one mind on how to handle the problem, the government has implemented piecemeal changes from widely vacillating perspectives. The result is a bloated, inefficient system which is increasingly difficult to fix.

While rugged individualism has served America well in things like pioneering inventions and colonizing a continent, it may be time to cast some control aside. The problem lies in the place of rugged individualism in capitalism. Capitalism is the economic system of the selfish. This economic system has helped to increase the costs of medicines, medical technology and doctors' salaries. By allowing business into the health care system, we have lost some of our social humanity. Poor people in European countries do not have to suffer as much as the poor in this country.

If we believe ourselves to be a people whose mission is to ensure that people have their basic rights — a principle that this country was founded on — we are hypocrites to allow our citizens to suffer.

The medical system in this country is doing everyone a disservice with its inefficiency. Perhaps Medicaid should be revamped into a national system which would provide basic preventative care. It would not take the place of private insurance but would act as a supplement for people in between jobs or for people who do not have jobs that provide health insurance. Making sure everyone has coverage should be the special province of this national system.

Although the fickle nature of the media is such that issues fall in and out of favor with startling speed, the health care debate is not done. It is merely awaiting a knight in shining armor.

You're gonna get squashed

How many of us ride the bus? How many of us depend on it to get back and forth to class, dorms and apartments? I am guessing that many of us rely on the PVTA which, I should add, is free. So why are there so many people who insist on complaining about this service that is provided to us at no cost? It should not be the riders who are complaining, but the bus drivers themselves. Has anyone noticed the complete idiots who walk out in front of cars and buses, without even looking?

Pedestrians do have the right of way, but not the right to abandon all common sense, or the right to step out in front of a bus 20 feet away. Do they really think they will not get hit? No, obviously not, so it is hard to fathom how this moronic behavior takes place daily, hourly. I have seen many bus drivers slam on the brakes because some jackass put his nose up and defiantly stepped in the road. The driver can only shake their head in frustration.

The state should add an addendum to the "right of way" law, and mount cameras on the top of each bus, facing out onto the road. Every time some idiot walks out in front without looking, and God forbid gets hit, a jury can look at the video and decide that the driver cannot beheld responsible for the moron who got squashed.

They could call it the "idiot clause." It is a matter of physics. It is a matter of (what a friend called) "natural selection." Anyone who decides to take their chances with a large, moving object like a bus, deserves what they get, and they probably wouldn't survive to pass on their "idiot" genes to make more little idiots.

Remember what mama taught us when we were three? It was simple then and it is still simple now; look both ways before you cross. We are students at a university of what some call higher education; this is a concept that we should be able to grasp without too much difficulty.

The people who step out in front of the buses are probably the same people that you hear whining and fussing endlessly about being late. Have you ever heard these comments? "I've been waiting here for 20 minutes!" or "The last 10 buses have been out of service," or "All the buses are going to Sunderland," or finally "I'm cold?"

Alright, sometimes the buses are late, but do you really think that the drivers are doing it to you personally? Have you ever heard of traffic? Maybe they are late because everyone keeps walking out in front of them. At one bus stop, I saw a driver just sit there as she watched one student after another step out in front of her. There were three buses and about 15 cars backed up behind her because of the "pedestrian's right of way." Yeah, that bus is going to be late. As for being cold — it's April, so dress warmer.

Scott Baehr

There is this "hair follicly challenged" guy that rides the North Amherst bus who never ceases to stop his complaining about late buses. Well here is an idea for you: drink six less beers the night before, get up a half hour earlier, and shut up. The busses are f@#ing free. What the PVTA should do, is start charting us. $1.50 per ride or $350 a year, tokens only... no cash. That would shut him up, but it still might not make some people happy. Someone recently complained about the PVTA and said that they had to wait over 20 minutes every time they needed to take the bus. Really? 20 minutes every time? Well, obviously some of us don't like to exercise.

A friend of mine who lives in Sylvan told me that he never takes the bus because the time it takes to walk to class and the time it takes to ride are pretty much the same. Of course there are exceptions. Going from Southwest to Sylvan is a long haul, but how often do you have to do that? Today, I used the PVTA four times; I made two round trips using the notorious "Sunderland" route and the Northampton Express. Twice, the buses were early by one minute. One bus was late by two minutes, and the other one was late by three.

Is this a big deal? To cover their asses, the PVTA tells people to be at the bus stop 10 minutes early. Hey, even airlines say to be ready to board an hour before your scheduled flight. And yes, I know that sometimes the bus is very late. One time, the bus went right past the stop in front of the Newman Center and everyone had to walk back from the Hillel House, and yes, I was late for class, but it only happened once.

So hey! Are you one of those people that cries when a bus is late? Are you one of those people who walks out in front of moving vehicles? Well, I hope you're not, because you may fall into the "eliminated by natural selection" category. Be nice. The ride is free.

On April 15, Angela "Bay" Buchanan came to UMass to express her views on the importance of the "American Culture" in our society. She believes our culture is being threatened by a destruction of the family system. She blamed the deterioration of the family structure partly on the sexual revolution, which she called "enormously devastating." She claims that these immoral acts are what lead to high divorce rates. Buchanan stated that liberals use "the politics of intimidation" to silence conservative viewpoints.

I beg to differ with liberals in the aforementioned perspective. I totally believe, understand, and support Buchanan's point of view regarding this issue. Also, I understand that whenever someone tries to speak the truth, it is hard for people to handle it. I believe in being conservative in regard to Buchanan's point of view. Furthermore, I believe that if people of color were conservative towards the aforementioned perspective, a good percentage of them would not be in the predicament that they are in today. Many people of color would disagree, but I am expressing these issues from my perspective.

Hamilton S. Rodriques

I used to be one of those children that spent half of his life without a father. He was one of those "dead beat" fathers that spent his time corrupting, manipulating and using women. It is because of this behavior that I now have half brothers and sisters. Furthermore, I grew up with the mentality that I was supposed to sleep with as many girls as I could, because that is what was supposed to make me a man. I grew up hating women and wanting them just for sex.

Now, I do not understand the logic behind calling a women a "slut, tramp, whore, etc" when it is we men that made them that way. If we continue to denounce our women, then pretty soon we will have a race of babies that will hate the ladies, (which was mentioned in one of Tupac's songs.)

"By changing my mentality from being liberal to being conservative in regards to the above mentioned point of view, I noticed that life becomes easier."

My life experiences can give testimony as to why I perceive things from this perspective. I was one of those underprivileged children that grew up on the streets of Roxbury, influenced by sex, drugs, and violence; I was taught that it was alright to do those things. Also, I was taught to hate my people, and I learned how to manipulate, steal and use them instead of loving, helping, and learning from them. Throughout many years of being a fool, a little voice in my head was telling me that I needed to change for the better; however, I chose to ignore that voice.

But, when several life–threatening incidents occurred in my life, and no one was there to help me, I realized that I was throwing my life away. Therefore, I started listening to that voice and today my life is different. I learned that all I had to do was to strengthen my spirituality and I could be able to achieve anything in this world. I started believing that I have a purpose in life, which gave me motivation to become a respectable individual in this society.

By changing my mentality from being liberal to being conservative in regards to the above mentioned point of view, I noticed that life becomes easier. I have learned to get rid of the unnecessary things that were destroying my life. And now I can see that light down the road that will guide me to success.

I would like to applaud Angela "Bay" Buchanan for speaking the truth, and I hope that people can analyze what she said and understand the truth. Despite the fact that I did not support her view on race relations, her overall presentation made total sense to me. Nevertheless, if people of color were conservatives in relation to Buchanan's presentation, a lot of us would have more control and stability within our lives.

Conspiracy theory

I'm one of those people that has, what one might call, an overactive imagination. My mind travels in floods of stupid remarks. I have come up with highly developed theories on just about everything that concerns the mundane lives of your average, everyday UMass student.

Now, we've all heard those nasty rumors about the risks of getting crushed to death by a flurry of falling bricks while walking by the W.E.B. DuBois Library. We know the theories that tell us how the library wasn't designed to hold books and how it's sinking into the ground at a rate of .00000001 feet per year (all figures are estimated, of course!)

But my personal theory varies slightly from these oft told tales of campus lore.

I believe that the top four floors of the library (yes, the ones with the black windows and no apparent elevator access) are the headquarters of top secret government missions. Ever wonder why there are so many functions on the dorm phones? If you can crack the code, which must be some combo of voice mail passwords and long distance PIN numbers, you just might be able to launch a nuclear warhead from the top of everyone's favorite phallic symbol. Think about it, there's more than good ole electricity powering those elevators, baby!

Elsa Allen

While I'm on the administration, let's talk Whitmore. Very scary. Very scary. Okay, so there's just not much more to say about that, except that someone just told me that it was designed by the same people who designed the Pentagon. Hmmm... If same people who designed the Pentagon. Hmmm... If same people who designed the Pentagon. Hmmm... If same people who designed the Pentagon. Hmmm... If that doesn't solidify some of my other theories, I don't know what does.

Okay, so maybe I'm a little far fetched. Just a little. Since I'm all about keeping it real, try this theory on for size.

As a freshman, you enter UMass and are introduced to a vast array of foods including some form of buffalo chicken and blue cheese dressing. By the way, notice how the valley is just about the only place in the world that considers buffalo chicken and blue cheese a viable topping for pizza and calzones? Anyway, at first, you can't get enough of this stuff. You realize that you have developed a dependency. You wake up at noon on a Saturday and absolutely cannot function until the D.P. Dough guy is at your door with a Buffalo Zone and two cans of Coke. You begin to crave buffalo sauce, even resorting to stealing bottles of Red Hot sauce from the table settings at restaurants (so I've heard.)

My first theory on this is that buffalo sauce contains a highly addictive chemical, more so than the best street dope you can find. Hmmm... low on cash, start selling buffalo chicken to freshman who are still on the meal plan. But I digress...

For a couple of years it is possible to come to gripes with the addiction, live a normal life, etc. Then one day, you realize that you are no longer dependent on the spicy sweetness of buffalo sauce. Ready for theory number two? Once you have conquered this addiction, you are ready to graduate. Credits, schmedits, use the buffalo sauce gauge for graduation preparedness.

Now, there is one exception to this rule, Charlie's 10¢ wing night. There is no recovery from the promise of a spicy dinner for under a buck. Props to Annette and all the Charlie's folk who help support us recovering addicts by giving us an excuse to get wings and beer on a Tuesday night.

It has taken me four years to quench my yearning for buffalo sauce, which I never really liked very much before I found it in the form of a calzone. I can now leave the valley and enter the world that does not consider blue cheese as a crucial part of the food pyramid.

Maybe the fact that I have been on this campus long enough to develop these theories should tell me that I am ready to leave. Maybe the fact that I have been here long enough to rise to a position that would actually allow me to spout out these cockamamie theories should tell me that I better leave before someone, ahh... makes me leave. At any rate, don't take me seriously, please. I've been brainwashed by the subliminal messaging that is placed on all campus overhead projectors. Ahh, but that's another column.

The end of the world as we know

People are beginning to worry about the destruction of the world that is supposed to occur as we enter the second millennium since people made a mistake in calculating Christ's birth date and ended up missing the right year by about six years. In case you were wondering, I really don't have a lot of faith in the idea that just because we have counted 2,000 years since a particular date that it means we are going to end up like little insignificant particles of cosmic dust once the year 2000 arrives.

This isn't to say that I don't believe we are all going to die in the year 2000; its just to say that dying because it is the year 2000, seems to me very un-American. As Americans, we need to find a much better reason for the world to end than just the fact that some silly little year has come.

So I decided (since it was Patriot's Day) to do something patriotic for my fellow Americans. Namely, I've found just a few signs that the world will in fact end in the year 2000. First of all, just by simply rearranging the letters in "year two thousand" you can get the cryptic message, "END, WHOA! Satyr out!" Now you can call me a wacko, but I think that this is a definite message from a satyr (half man, half goat from Greek Mythology; take Classics 224 if you want to learn more) telling us that the end is coming.

Chris Collins

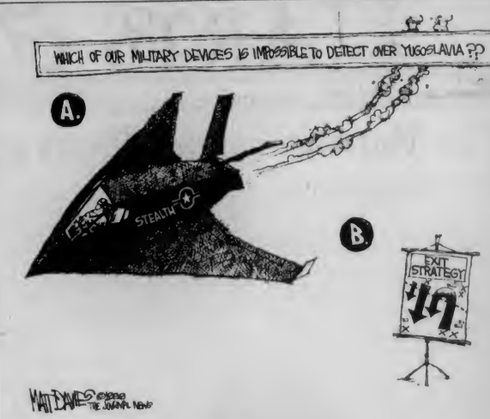
Now, I know that some of you would think that relying on a mythical beast and rearranging letters to tell the future is less than, well, sane, but considering we are relying on a sex crazed "50–something" to run our government, I would have to say that I am more than willing to take my chances with the half goat.

Speaking of good old president Clinton, if you read carefully into his name "William Clinton," you just might come out with "Monica will lint" which I think really speaks for itself. Besides I mean, what could I say about that anyway, other than that I truly think it proves my methods are more than valid.

Anyway, I agree that in all honesty, the rearrangement thing probably won't be all that accepted by the general public, so I've come up with a few more signs that the world is, in fact, going to end in the year 2000:

1.) Mike Messaros, statesman, editor. English major. frequent buyer/seller of pornography, and columnist composed his "Notes from the Campus Center Basement" just last week. Now, we all have laughed at Mike (and occasionally his writing) but his leaving the Collegian, as embodied in his last article proves that there is truly no reason for the human race to continue its existence in any shape, form or function. Let's all be honest folks, life really isn't worth living without good old Mike.

2.) An obvious sign is that a UMass team other than men's basketball has become national champion of their given sport, namely the unpublicized UMass women's hamster throwers who just this week captured the ultimate glory of their sport and have brought home (in addition to a great deal of airsick hamsters) the National Hands Her Way Hamster Hurling Trophy as well as a check for $32.17 from an exclusive hamster food contract that the University had carefully negotiated with whatever hamster food company was willing to return their call.



3.) Cher is making a comeback. I really don't think that I need to explain this anymore, it's kind of a given as to why we are going to die because of this.

4.) I needed to get something at Whitmore, and one, I didn't have to cross a picket line and two, I only had to wait in line for under half an hour. Now, taken separately these two things mean nothing, but taken together, they are pointing to a dark spot on the horizon, a time when time will stop moving forward and begin to move backward and then side to side, until time is doing a little bit of a cha-cha, and then perhaps the electric slide or the limbo.

5.) The D.C. food is occasionally being served at lukewarm temperatures as opposed to the cold, often frozen hockey puck objects that were once their best meal. I mean, I actually was able to stomach everything on my plate today — well except the chicken; it was too salty, and the potatoes kinda mushy, and the peas which grabbed my fork and threatened to eat me as a sign of some vegetarian extremism, — but still all of it was warm which means that the end of the world is just around the corner.

So University of Mass, (which can be rearranged to spell "Mesa fuss tin ivory" and you know what that means) beware because I think I've seen the future and it really doesn't look all that good for us.

MATT DAVIS/THE SHAWN NEWS

Trial by jury?

For the first time in Colorado, the death penalty was delivered not by a jury, but by a panel of judges. Amidst much controversy last week, a panel of three judges, which cited reluctance in the jury to find that the murder was intentional, voted unanimously to give convicted murderer Rubert Riggan a death sentence.

The 1995 state law, like Nebraska's, transfers death penalty decisions from the jury to a panel of judges. The panel is headed by the trial judge, and completed by two other judges appointed by the Chief Justice of the Colorado Supreme Court.

As The New York Times reported, this law is heavily supported by prosecutors. They believe that juries are hesitant to levy a death sentence, and furthermore that juries should not be given the death penalty decision.

Jason Wiesenbloch

The major questions surrounding Riggan's case are not about his guilt. Instead, they deal with the death sentence itself and moreover the method in which it was given to Riggan. Denver lawyer and legal analyst, Andrew Cohen, commented, "I think this was a just result but a terrible procedure," referring to the new judiciary panel system.

Cohen also believes the new panel system will be "likely to skew the process much more in favor of death sentence," in terms of capital crimes. Not that I rely on Cohen's opinion for predicting the future, but he addresses one of the many inherent flaws in such a law as giving a judiciary panel the power to hand down death sentences.

In fact, the newly enforced law has been so problematic for Colorado judges that a judge of a future panel will resign because of his problems with the law's ethics. His resignation will come exactly one week before he was scheduled to serve on the panel.

However, Ray Slaughter, executive director of the Colorado District Attorneys' Council, defends the new law as "constitutionally correct and rational." He also states that the unusual increase in convictions sought with the death penalty in the near future are coincidence and not effects of the new law. Of course, as noted before, prosecutors were the ones most in favor of the new law.

Regardless of whether or not the upcoming high influx of death penalty cases is coincidence or effects of the new law, the problems this law creates still exist. This law takes one piece of the trial–by–jury system the Constitution guarantees its citizens, and puts it in the control of judges. Not that we should question the judges' ability to make a decision, but instead it is whether or not they should be given even greater power than they already have in cases.

It is well known that the judge a case is given to has some influence into the pace of the trial, what evidence is admitted, or what questions are allowed by lawyers. Giving this same judge the position of chairperson of a three person committee later to vote on a death sentence begins to hand one person an even greater control in the overall outcome of capital punishment cases. One of the reasons for having a Congress so powerful in America is to prevent a sitting President from having too much influence in the country.

Furthermore, having two other judges appointed by someone always brings into question just how randomly these judges are appointed. While selection of a jury certainly can involve a one–sided selection of a type of juror, at least in a jury of random citizens one cannot guarantee any bias toward a certain outcome.

What bothers me most, though, is the prosecutors' feelings about jurors' reluctancy to give out death sentences. This suggests — at least in Colorado — that prosecutors no longer trust the judgement of jurors, and instead feel that they are more intelligent or better qualified to make decisions regarding a sentencing for convicted first–degree murderers.

I feel that this law not only disrespects the judgement of the jurors, it also suggests that those educated in the law at least sometimes feel that parts of the criminal justice system could sustain itself without citizen input. These prosecutors and the law's supporters seem to forget that the public, not a select group of lawyers or judges, should be the decisive factors in ending someone's life. The decision should reflect the judgements of random people, not of a group within it.

Of course, the entire problem could be solved by eliminating the need for anyone to decide on a death sentence by eliminating the option. People like Riggan already have a life sentence. To me, killing him is only an act of revenge, an eye–for–an–eye justice that will not stop a criminal any more than a jail will.

Moreover, it is a known fact that the death penalty is not a deterrent in those states with it...for capital crimes are not per person lower there than those without it. In a predominantly Christian country, I continue to wonder why those of its various faiths believe in the death penalty when it contradicts their religious beliefs profoundly.

Massachusetts Governor Paul Cellucci himself wishes to bring the death penalty back to this state. His efforts failed this year, but certainly have not stopped. However, he and many residents ignore that a main reason this state stopped killing convicted murders is because it wrongly convicted two in the 1930s, killed them, and only later found they were innocent. Prosecutors want more death sentences and will only increase the chance of this happening again in this country, especially with a law created around the intent of eliminating reluctance to kill the convicted.

Doonesbury BY GARRY TRUDEAU

We love Ed/Op!

I'll show you a protest

In the spirit of all the protesting on campus, I'd like to throw my own hat into the ring. Now, I know my issues probably aren't as big or important as freshman admission concerns or the war in Kosovo. Rather, I would like to protest some smaller things that are a little closer to home. I would like to protest some of the many things that are wrong with this school, if the MASSPIRG people don't mind me borrowing the steps of the Student Union for a second.

First off, I'd like to raise issue with the "food" that we are expected to eat. Why must we suffer with such bad food and service? When the food resembles the lunch lady behind the counter (old, bitter, and cold) someone should say something. How can anyone expect to do well in their studies when they're sitting on the can five minutes after they've left the DC? I don't think it's fair for us students, to be subjected to food that is probably illegal in 48 states — Texas and Alabama being the exceptions.

Why can't we eat well? My solution: privatize Dining Services. Then there would be competition for the companies serving us the food. If we didn't like it, we could all unite and assemble at Franklin (and we wouldn't even bother anyone, because nobody really wants to go to the D.C.'s) and force the administration to contract another company that would give us yummy food (or at least warm food. I'd settle for warm food at this point, and a chicken finger too!)

Which leads me to my next protest, if I could borrow the Student Union from the affirmative action people for a sec. Privatization? Why is this a bad idea? We must all unite and break up the monopoly that the Text Book Annex has over us. I'm sorry, Text Book Annex, but I am sick and tired of shelling out my hard earned cash for some overly priced– page missing–written by my professor–books. So I'm gonna support privatizing your ass! Maybe you should read one of your ratty, old economics books. Hello and welcome to the United States, we function on a market economy here. But I heard Cuba is looking for a Textbook Annex and I think you guys seem to be exactly what they're looking for.

Alexander Wood

Do you really think that the evil empire of Barnes and Nobles will raise the prices even more on the books? Go ahead and let them and we'll just protest again and the administration will contract another book company who will do the job for a cheaper price. Are you beginning to see how this whole capitalist thing works? Unless you're concerned that your evil, overpriced cohorts in Amherst center will lose their business too.

Which you should be, because a larger book dealer will have all of our books right on campus and be able to send away for them. And they will also have people that will actually help us find those books when we want them and they would probably buy our books back from us for more than 1/16 the original price — sucks to be Atticus Bookstore in that case.

And sorry about the student run businesses, but if we go by Parking Services logic ("to go from $10 to $20 to $60 isn't going to kill anybody.") then firing 10 or 20 or 100 students isn't going to kill anybody either. Ha, student run this! The Bike Co–op doesn't really exist anyway, or if it does then nobody would ever know it (even the ticket people next door have a sign that says they don't know when the co–op is open!) since they have hours that make bankers jealous. I always thought that door was an art department project or something.

Which is another thing I'd like to protest, while I'm borrowing the Student Union Steps. To the Art and Theater Department; thanks for letting me know you're putting on a show. I figured that out after I saw one of your flyers, and unfortunately, I will continue to see the many millions of flyers for which show that you dispersed all over our already ugly campus, for years to come. Or at least until the bio– degrade into the soil or someone picks them up. I'm betting they'll bio–degrade and disintegrate first though.

Holy Mohammed! Is it really necessary to "uglify" our tree–less and grass–less campus and my dorm and the sidewalks with trillions of flyers and posters for your plays? Try putting one poster up and making it really big instead. I think people can figure out from the first flyer they see that you're putting on a show and when it is. If I were homeless I would definitely live on this campus. Forget sleeping on the bench covered with a newspaper. I'd collect all the flyers and posters and build a paper mansion around the bench with them all. And it would be nice, until either it rained or some hippie came along and rolled it into a giant joint; I'm betting the hippie would roll it first.

So, I know that my complaints aren't as big as the tree huggin', reverse discrimination or Kosovo affairs, but I think that if my issues were resolved it would make all of our lives a little bit easier and more comfortable. Thank you for the Student Union steps, Republican Club: Good luck impeaching the President.

The Rentals' latest album proves to be very, very Sharp

COURTESY MAVERICA RECORDING COMPANY

The Rentals deliver some catchy Euro-pop with their latest album, Seven More Minutes.

SEVEN MORE MINUTES
The Rentals
Maverick

Who expected this album to be this good? After spending God knows how long in Europe writing and recording this album, former Weezer bassist Matt Sharp has delivered one of the most pleasant surprises so far this year. From the first track, "Getting By," you can tell which direction Sharp wants to go with this disc — and that direction is miles away from the sound that was created with 1995's Return of the Rentals. Back then, The Rentals was just Sharp's side project while he was working with Weezer. Now that The Rentals is his full time gig, he seems to be taking the band more seriously.

Not entirely gone are the Moogs that characterized The Rentals' original sound and the hit single "Friends of P." They are just toned down as Sharp adopts a more Brit-pop influenced sound evocative of Parklife/Great Escape-era Blur (Damon Albarn even guests on the album, recorded in London.) Other guests on the album include vocalist/violinist Petra Hayden (part of the original incarnation of The Rentals back in 1995, along with Weezer drummer Patrick Wilson, and producer Tom Grimley,) former Lush guitarist Miki Berenyi, Elastica's Donna Matthews, and (drumroll...) Weezer frontman Rivers Cuomo.

Trax On Trax Off

As much as Sharp's departure from Weezer saddened fans, he has taken his own vision in an entirely new direction — creating a well crafted album that can only impress. A (Kevin Monahan)

PRAISE THE FALLEN
VNV Nation
Wax Trax/TVT

Electronic industrial is a genre of music that seems to only be getting better, while all other music gets worse. VNV Nation's release, Praise The Fallen is a perfect example of this theory. It is very well done, with some room for improvement. It is aggressive and euphoric, with similar attributes of KMFDM and Skinny Puppy.

Tracks like "Joy" and "Voice" give the listener a good dose of what darkwave music sounds like. Some of the songs on this album sound a bit formulaic though, making parts of the album sound similar. However, none of the album is boring or monotonous and VNV Nation adheres to the formula very well, so they must be given credit for that.

Praise The Fallen is an impressive early release from a band that will most likely mature to be an influential name in their genre. B (K.M.)

ALWAYS STAY SWEET
His Name is Alive
4AD

Some of this album is beautiful. Some of it sounds like gospel music, so I think you can tell where it goes from there. "As We Could Ever (We Could)" is the album's best track. Sifting through all 21 tracks on this album in order to find something worth listening to can be a chore. You will find it, and it might even be worth the effort, but just the fact that the worthwhile material is few, and in some cases, far between will be aggravating.

Disappointing, to say the least. C (K.M.)

THE POSTPUNK CHRONICLES: GOING UNDERGROUND
Various Artists
Rhino

This is part two of a three part review, as this is the second volume in a three volume series that we have covered. Basically its a high concept mix tape, made by a former WMLA (91.1) DJ, who used to hang out at Northampton's now defunct Main Street Records.

This collection needs to be available on vinyl, as the artists making up the set list should reflect: The Smiths, Billy Bragg, The Jesus and Mary Chain, Pere Ubu, Sonic Youth with Lydia Lunch... the list goes on. Each disc in this collection showcases different artists — and not always the best songs from these artists, but hey, there's not much more you can ask for. This collection is fun and brings us back to the infancy of MTV, fanzines and synth-pop. Think real hard, we were all there. B (K.M.)

DEAD BEES ON A CAKE
David Sylvian
Virgin

Two words sum this up: jazzy pop. Since Sylvian's days with Japan, he has provided the world with his moody, deep-voiced ruminations on life. The production is ultra- smooth, almost lush. This is Sylvian's forte. Collaborations with top musicians such as Marc Ribot, Kenny Wheeler, Bill Frissell and Ryuichi Sakamoto result in atmospheric tunes that stretch on for many minutes. Several tracks shine ("Thalheim," "Alphabet Angel," and "Darkest Minutes) as a result of their sparseness and thought provoking lyrics.

The album disappoints when Sylvian and his crew experiment on free-form pieces or when Talvin Singh guests on tablas. The biggest let-down is the choice of his wife, Ingrid Chavez, as a guest spoken-word vocalist on a couple of tracks. Chavez, former Prince protege, has Sylvian's creativity sounding dangerously like new-age pop creation Enigma.

At 70 minutes in length, the omission of much of the mediocre material, would have resulted in a much stronger piece of work. B (Matthew Nixon)

Liman complicates with sweetness

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

GO
Directed by Doug Liman with Sarah Polley, Katie Holmes, and Jay Mohr Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield

Go begins with a bang. Loud music, bright, whirling lights and blurry dancers are chopped apart and reassembled as the credits roll. The sequence is sensual, new, exciting and intoxicating, the sort of thing that people mean when they talk about "movie magic." The movie as a whole is littered with magic, but director Doug Liman (Swingers) and screenwriter John August have the grace never to hit you over the head with it. They toss emeralds in the confusing junkyard of the movie's complicated plot lines (the Christmas lights inside the car, the surprising narrative connections, for example) and let you come across them yourself.

The plot consists of three interlocking stories. In the first, a sullen cashier (Sarah Polley) concocts a scheme to make rent money that involves leaving her best friend (Katie Holmes) as collateral with a drug dealer. In the second, another grocery store cashier, a violent, sweetly out-of- control Brit (Desmond Askew) and a smooth talking friend (Taye Diggs) get into trouble in Las Vegas. In the third, two nervous actors (Jay Mohr and Scott Wolf) try to buy drugs. The three stories weave together in fascinating ways, at times a little too neatly, but it would defeat the purpose of the movie to say how. The point of the movie is watching the story unfold, diverge, and come together in all its ragged glory. What can be said is that the acting is uniformly loose from indie-heroine Sarah Polley (The Sweet Hereafter,) who manages to make suburban angst seem deeply sad, all the way to Jay Mohr (Jerry Maguire) and Scott Wolf (Party of Five,) who together give their scenes a gentle, unexpected comic pull.

Director Liman's unpredictable visual style perfectly suits the movie's complicated plot and use of time. He excels at details, like giving actors space to be quirky but never letting them descend to caricature, like his Scorsese-circa- Mean Streets use of music to define emotion and tone, like his wonderfully relaxed handle on conversations. What he and screenwriter August don't do as well is the ordinary hip-teen-adventure-movie stuff, the whole ho-hum guns- strippers-and cars section that fills the middle of the movie and the tired what-do-we-do-with-the body thing that could have been lifted from the recent craptacular Very Bad Things. Also, it unfortunately seems to be the hip thing to do — to write about teenagers as interesting and intelligent yet selfish and unlikable. Fine actors like Polley and Mohr; and Liman's flair for coaxing the comic, sad, and human from bitter dialogue mostly overcome the script's overload of cynicism.

But the negative, less interesting aspects of the movie can't strangle its irrepressible energy. Go is a movie about things mixing together, movie cliches with transcendent imaginative moments, the flight of music with the mundane reality of the suburbs, the comic with the tragic, goodness with blind apathy. It's about nothing so much as motion. Like life, you can't follow it in a straightforward way. Sometimes, you have to just go. A-

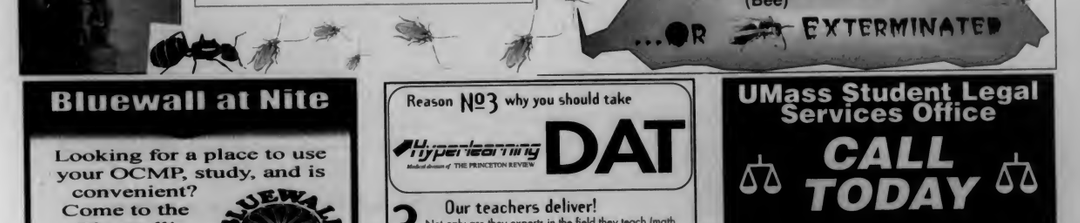
Lee's films truly a treasure

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff



Later this year, modestly talented pop star Jewel will make her acting debut in, of all things, a civil war drama called Run With the Devil. The thought is enough to send movie critics running for hills. What's next? Sarah McLachlan as a fighter pilot? But any fears are calmed by simply remembering that the movie is directed by Ang Lee, one of most talented directors working in American popular movies today.

The Taiwan-born Lee began his career with a trio of Madarin language films: the rich, sensual comedies Eat, Drink, Man, Woman and The Wedding Banquet as well an excellent first feature, Pushing Hands. Hands tells a story of cultural collision, of an elderly Chinese man who moves in with his son and his son's white, American wife. The movie unfolds in an indirect way, painting the tensions and tenderness in the family with precise, Impressionistic gestures. Pushing Hands displays many of the important aspects of Lee's style: his obsession with the push-and-pull of family affection, the pointed use of silence, the way the camera lingers over food, the careful positioning of characters within the frame and the use of windows and doors to create outer, public space at odds with inner, personal space. Threading all of this together is Lee's preoccupation with culture and ritual: the way he always asks why cultural acts like preparing food are important and shows us how cultural expectations can both deepen and interfere with our personal lives.

Like many great directors, Lee left his homeland and came to America. With that move also came a switch in subject matter toward explicitly Western and American subjects. His first English language picture is an adaption of Jane Austen's classic Sense and Sensibility. Although it does not have the emotional depth of Lee's other movies, it does prove that Lee does have what it takes to be a top-notch Hollywood storyteller. He takes Austen's shrillest, most narrow-minded novel and turns it into a reassuring study of the tension between love and responsibility. The movie is almost too smooth. All the interesting stuff, like the fascinating work with doorways, all but vanishes in the carefully pretty cinematography.

Lee fully comes into his own as an American filmmaker with The Ice Storm, a haunting, disarmingly gentle take on Rick Moody's lush, pretentious novel about a white, suburban family coming apart on a Thanksgiving weekend in the late 70s. The movie is a perfect example of how to portray the confusion of family life without condemning or absolving its characters. Lee is far more interested in expressing what people feel than in judging them. He draws heartbreaking emotions from his actors, especially Tobey Maguire and Cristina Ricci, without ever disturbing the serene surface of the movie. Lee instead expertly uses tone, pace, framing and surrounding detail to express meaning. You're spooked by certain scenes, but, since the acting is so deadpan, you can't immediately place why. It's like looking into the calm surface of a dark lake and not being able to see the bottom. To this solid foundation, Lee adds all his old tricks and some new ones: eerie music, repeated use of windows and doors to define the emotional and private spaces in a scene, gorgeous use of silence, and an indescribably evocative use of weather.

The Ice Storm was strangely ignored by critics when it came out. Movies about the pressures and rewards of culture and family do not usually clean up at the Oscars. In any case, Ang Lee is a master stylist who leaves his thoughtful stamp on movies with wildly different subjects. For this reason, his newest movie Ride with the Devil should be the most anticipated movie of 1999. Star Wars or no Star Wars, Jewel or no Jewel.

game, Marci Hupp was the high scorer in leading UMass to victory. Claudi Clement, Grogan, and Megan Thompson each added two goals. All six saves were made by Dana Sinkwihh.

In the championship game, UMass competed against Harvard. This was the closest game of the weekend according to McOsker. "Harvard was the biggest challenge of the weekend," he said.

The Harvard game was closer than the others, but 12–5 is not that close in terms of water polo. UMass was up 3–1 at the end of the first period quarter, but the Minutewomen scored four unanswered goals in the second to take a 7–1 lead at the half.

Grogan yet again showed why she is an All–American by equaling the Harvard score. The junior tallied five goals of her own. Megan Perry, Hupp, and Claudia Clement each added two goals en route to their successful title defense.

The team seems to be clicking on all cylinders and is in good shape to defend their Eastern Championship. With Grogan playing at such a high level and the entire team having solfd performances, it appears the team is among the elite on the east coast.

"Princeton, Maryland and us are equally seeded, and it is going to come down to whoever wants it the most," said Coach Dan McOsker.

The Minutewonsen's desire can not be questioned, they are ready to defend their title. But according to McOsker, the team "still has not played their best game."

If the team is to continue its success, it will have play that "best game" soon.

Minutewomen Notes: Since coming from Boston College, Coach Dan McOsker has had nothing but success here at UMass. He is now 54–12 overall, compiling a winning percentage of .818. He received the Collegiate Water Polo Association Coach of the Year honors in 1998 when the team won the Eastern Conference title and finished eighth at nationals.

"They also played very dirty. At one point I was punched in the face. And we don't play dirty, we didn't stupe to their level."

The Minutewomen led off the contest with the Tigers with a three-point penalty kick scored by Danielle Tagg. The Minutewomen fell victim in their game with the Tigers, losing on a couple of mistakes that resulted in trys.

The Minutewomen; who lead 3–0 after the first ten minutes of the contest, lost momentum after they turned the ball over. UMass lost an interception which resulted in a try for the Tigers. Princeton converted on the extra–kick and were up 15–3.

"The girl was offside on the interception but you know those calls happen in games, but I think Princeton was surprised at how tough our defense was and that they were only up 8–3 at the half," Karuso said.

After allowing another try the Minutewomen, who were overmatched in the front, lost a scrum near the goal that swung around too much and the officials failed to blow the play dead. It resulted in the Tigers final try.

"The interception definitely shifted the momentum, and they had stronger forwards. We were faster, but they were definitely stronger," forward Cristi Canali said. "They scored on some fluky plays, on the last one in the scrum they should have blown that dead."

UMass isn't finished. They are sending six players to a camp for the U.S. Under–23 team, and will only lose three seniors. As for UMass, the future looks good.

well and was also a season best for any Minutewoman performer.

Sally Hirsch brought home second in the 5,000 meters with a personal best time of 17:18.83. The PR allows her to compete in the ECACs.

To round out the ECAC qualifiers was the 4x100 relay squad that consisted of Bryan, Raqueil Shelton, Abby Rubino, and Irish. The squad has been the most consistent so far this season and on Saturday they "looked great," LaFreniere said.

Nicole Way claimed third place and Kristin Cosowski placed fifth in the 1,500 meters. In the 1,500 meters they faced some of the premier competition in the region.

In the 4x400, the team of Andrea Comeau, Kate Toye, Taneka Miller, and Irish had their strongest showing of the season, finishing with a time of 3:54.03. Comeau had a strong start and Irish provided an impressive finish in the last leg.

Erin Hankard placed second in the triple jump with a leap of 34–feet–9.5–inches. In the long jump, Melanie Bell looked "real strong," according to LaFreniere, with a jump of 18– feet–5–inches.

A new school record was set in the pole vault when Rhianna DaCruz vaulted 10–feet–6–inches. The leap was good enough to place her second overall.

UMass had a strong showing in the discus claiming third, fourth and fifth place. Alison Tostevin (125–feet–7), Carole LaPlante (110–feet–1), and Shannon Hamilton (108–feet–.7) took the honors, respectively. In the javelin, Nielle Giffune placed third with a toss of 117–feet–6–inches.

Overall, LaFreniere was pleased with the performance put forth by the Minutewomen. "Everyone is striving to do their best. The team was focused on the right things. I'm very pleased with the attitude of the team," LaFreniere said.

The Minutewomen will be in action tomorrow when they travel to Philadelphia, Penn., for the famous Penn Relays, hosted by the University of Pennsylvania.

Crew faces another loss

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

Coming off their recent loss to No. 1 Virginia, the Massachusetts women's crew team attempted to regroup as they squared off against a talented Northeastern and a vengeful Columbia last weekend in New York. But after all was said and done, the Minutewomen came in second to the Huskies while Columbia took third.

"We got beat again," the Massachusetts women's crew assistant coach Kate Hubbard said. "We raced Northeastern and we knew it was an important race, but we lost."

UMass' varsity eight crew team finished second with a time of 6:12.4, five seconds behind Northeastern.

"[We] would have done it a little bit better in the last 500 meters," Hubbard said. "We were in the outside lane and we hit some really rough water, which slowed us way down. We were pretty disappointed."

In the second varsity eight race, UMass took the first place with a little drama by edging Northeastern by four–tenths of a second with a time of 6:01.

The UMass varsity fours blew away Columbia as they finished with an impressive time of 6:15.1 to Columbia's 6:36.9.

In both the first novice eight team and the second novice eight team, UMass came in second to Northeastern with times of 7:03.6 and 6:26.3, respectively.

"I think we should have beaten Northeastern last week," UMass coach Jim Dietz said. "[But we] just haven't been up to the speed that we are capable of."

Dietz pointed the blame mostly on the varsity eight team; a team that won silver medal in last year's NCAA's. He felt that if they raced better, the others would follow. He also openly complained that the members of the team were not stepping up. Dietz felt that his team was underachieving and that he was very disappointed.

"The team just doesn't gel — just doesn't move together," Dietz said. "On paper, they should have been much faster than the teams they are racing, but they are just not together both mentally and physically."

It's hard to imagine the Minutewomen to be in this position. With this loss to Northeastern, UMass has dropped to No. 13 in the country according to the US Rowing coach's poll, three places shy of qualifying for the NCAAs.

"It doesn't look good [to get into] NCAAs," Hubbard said. "We will definitely have our first boat to go, but our goal is to get the team [to go]."

The Minutewomen are running out of time. They will race this weekend in New Jersey to participate in 1999 Bell Atlantic/Atlantic 10 Championships on the Cooper River in Camden, N.J. If there is any power and character left in this Minutewomen squad, they better bring a winning mentality with them this Saturday to the championships.

The Massachusetts men's tennis program finished the regular season strong this past weekend with two victories, beating Fordham and Seton Hall.

The Minutemen easily put away the Rams of Fordham, with a 6–1 win on Thursday. Todd Cheney and doubles partner Bo Navarro continued their winning streak by beating Matt Kochis and Will Klocke, 8–0. Cheney was also able to down Matt Kochis in his singles match, 6–1 and 6–3. Freshman Steve Prisco was the only Minuteman to lose, falling 6–4 and 6–3 to the hands of Fordham's Alex Bamelia.

On Friday, Massachusetts was given an unexpected rest due to the weather conditions and was unable to pursue a victory over Hartford.

The Minutemen stayed at home for their last match of the year and came out victorious, beating Seton Hall 5–2. Rob Manchester beat Mark Vanderelst, 6–3 and 6–1, for his second win of the weekend. The walk–on phenom Bill Greener continued to shine, as he easily put away John Macrina, 6–1, 6–0.

"Bill Greener has been huge for us," said UMass coach Judy Dixon. "He's just been a welcome surprise."

The No. 2 doubles team of Navarro and Cheney were once again the victors, defeating Mark Vanderelst and Ian Rickel 8–4, extending their hot streak to six matches. Their streak began in March against Colgate.

Cheney also won in his singles match, beating Todd Green, 6–1, 6–5. The victory extended his singles streak to five matches. With his win against Seton Hall, Cheney moved within two victories from being the all–time winningest singles player in UMass history.

"He had a wonderful career," said Dixon of Cheney. "I'm glad he finished on top."

Now the men's tennis team has set its sights on Dayton in the Atlantic 10 championship tournament in Blacksburg, Va. UMass fell to Dayton 5–2 early in April but are looking for revenge against the No. 5 seeded Fliers.

Winning against Dayton would put the Minutemen in the semi–finals of the Atlantic 10 championship. With the two victories this past weekend, UM looks in great shape to do just that.

"I'm pleased with the effort and results [versus Fordham and Seton Hall," said Dixon. "My only concern is No. 1. Steve [who] is having a tough time with dual matches."

Prisco and the rest of the men's team will be practicing hard this week in preparation for the upcoming championships this weekend.

UM falls to Pirates

By Matt O'Neill
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team's record fell to .500 (5–5) with a loss to Seton Hall University on Sunday.

The Pirates dominated the wind swept match, taking four of the six singles matches.

Coach Judy Dixon felt disheartened at the loss. "This loss really sticks in my throat," Dixon said. "We had two three– set matches that were really difficult. If we go into the doubles tied 3–3, we have a good shot at winning, but, instead we went in down 4–2 and needed all three doubles."

The two singles wins came from Ali Tross (6–4, 6–3) and Annie Hamilton (6–1, 6–7, 6–1).

Dixon also felt that the play of No. 2 singles, Ola Gerasimova, could have turned the match in the Minutewomen's favor.

"[The] No. 2 (singles) proved to be huge," Dixon said. "Ola was playing beautifully, then in the second set she lost her confidence and couldn't hit a single ball in the rest of the game."

The poor play continued for UMass into the doubles part of the contest. The Minutewomen dropped two of the three games to the Pirates, taking only the No. 2 slot, by a score of 8–6.

"Annie and Ali played very well (at the No. 2 slot)," Dixon said. "They are really gelling as a team."

The play of both Hamilton and Tross were what pleased the coach the most about the Seton Hall match.

"Annie really stepped up big time. Big matches seem to make her better," Dixon said. "Ali is the key to their doubles play, they are both playing very well right now."

Dixon felt that the Seton Hall team was just mentally tougher than the Minutewomen were.

"They attacked the ball better than we did," Dixon said. "We were more tentative and that was the difference in the match."

The other match from this weekend play for UMass was cancelled due to rain. The Minutewomen were to face Villanova University in Storrs, Connecticut on Saturday.

Yanks blank Texas, AL wrap–up

By Josh Dubow
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Nearly seven months later, the Texas Rangers still can't hit New York Yankees pitching.

David Cone allowed three hits in eight innings and Paul O'Neill hit two home runs to lead New York to a 4–0 victory yesterday night, snapping a four–game losing skid.

O'Neill broke out of an 0–for–15 slump with a two–run homer in the first and a solo shot in the third for the Yankees, who got their first shutout win of the year avoided their first five–game slide since September 1997.

The Rangers, who scored just one run and batted .141 against New York in last year's division series, couldn't do any better Tuesday.

Devil Rays 5, Orioles 3

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) — Scott Erickson (0–3) was chased after just five outs as Baltimore lost its fourth straight. At 3–10, the Orioles are off to their worst start since their lost 21 straight at the start of the 1988 season.

Erickson allowed five runs and eight hits, raising his ERA to 12.41. Julio Santana (1–2), backed by a 5–0 second inning lead, allowed one run and two hits in six–plus innings as Tampa Bay stretched a winning streak to three for the first time since last Aug. 27–29. Roberto Hernandez pitched the ninth and became the first Al. pitcher with five saves.

Blue Jays 5, Angels 1

TORONTO — Tony Fernandez hit a three–run double and Kelvim Escobar (2–0) allowed one runs and right hits in 6 1–3 strong innings as Toronto won its sixth straight.

With the score 1–all in the fifth, Chuck Finley (1–2) nearly escaped a bases–loaded jam after getting Jose Cruz Jr. to pop out and Shawn Green to strike out. But he forced in a run by walking Carlos Delgado and Fernandez followed with his double for a 5–1 lead.

Indians 5, Athletics 1

CLEVELAND — Bartolo Colon (3–0) allowed three hits in six innings, and Steve Reed, Mark Langston and Paul Shuey followed with hitless relief as Cleveland matched its 10–2 start of last season. Jim Thome hit a solo homer in the third off Kenny Rogers (0–2), who have up five runs — four earned — and eight hits in 5 2–3 innings.

tunities," said Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone regarding his team's play over the weekend.

The Minutemen have been led offensively by a pair of outfielders. Freshman Mike Kulak has the top batting average on the squad with a .403 mark, while senior Aaron Braunstein is second on the team with a .350 average. Braunstein leads the Minutemen in four different offensive categories, including home runs (seven) and RBI (33.)

Other top hitters for the Minutemen include redshirt freshman Scott Anderson, freshman Chris Morgan and seniors Brian Samela and Bryan Mazzaferro. Junior second baseman Shaun Skeffington has also shown consistency in the leadoff spot, batting .299 with 23 stolen bases this season.

The Catamounts come into today's game as winners of seven of their last eight games, the only blemish coming in 4–0 loss to Drexel in game one of a doubleheader on Sunday.

Vermont has been led by junior catcher Bob Acabbo, a former third baseman in high school and early on in his UVM career. The former Notre Dame of West Haven (Conn.) standout sports a .361 average and leads the team with three home runs.

Other top threats for Vermont include Wade Rikert (.358), Josh Tehonica (.348), Mark Denzine (.348), Kyle Rikert (.326) and Kyle Miller (.306).

isher, by over 35 feet. A startling feat, indeed, and his discus throw was just as impressive. No one could spin the dish within 20 feet of his mark of 181–feet. Somebody has been eating his Wheaties, ladies and gentlemen.

Apparently, Vic has been joined at breakfast recently by senior Tom Toye. Toye was a double–winner in the 100– meter and 200–meter dashes last week, and he continued his success this past Saturday. His 100–meter dash performance of 10.86 seconds was good enough for a solid third–place finish. He came on even stronger in the 200–meters, as he earned a time of 21.57 seconds, good enough for first place. It was about four–tenths of a second better than David Klemic, his closest competitor, who represented Northeastern in the event.

Other seniors contributed in a big way, as well. Ben Baraldi placed first in the 110–meter high hurdles with a time of 14.64 seconds. Fellow upper–classman B.J. Cardoza flung the hammer 197–feet–five–inches, 21 feet further than anyone else, to earn another UMass victory. Neil Concepcion rounded out the senior winners with his time of 48.41 seconds in the 400–meter dash. It was an impressive showing by the most experienced members of the team.

Help was also received from a couple of surprise sources. A tandem of freshmen stepped up and made big contributions. Alex Maravel–Piccolo, of Greenlawn, N.Y., won the 400–meter hurdles in 56.25 seconds, at the meet last season, and it is hoped that he can once again lead the charge to victory.

Morrency was the first Minuteman in UMass history to win an event at the meet last season, and it is hoped that he can once again lead the charge to victory.

fine job done by each of the underclassmen, from whom little has been heard from thus far, and it shows the outstanding team depth of this current UMass team.

This depth has become more and more evident each week, as UMass has grown stronger with each performance. Though there weren't any scoring points in this past week's meet, (the meet was a more individual–intensive event), the Minutemen proved once again that it is a force to be reckoned with.

They will look to keep the momentum in full swing this upcoming weekend, as they head to the Penn Relays.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You know how to get what you want, and you know that you can do it if you apply yourself. Today's the day to take that first big step.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Your independent manner will win your both admiration and criticism today. It is up to you which carries the most weight.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Keep your wits about you today, and be sure to take in all the information before setting yourself free. Don't trust in blind fate.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Someone may be trying to unload a great deal of unwanted baggage on you today. You'll know where to draw the line and how to do so!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Stay in touch with that voice in the back of your head that's telling you what to do when your conscious thoughts are in a jumble.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You can rise above your own fears and apprehensions today, and in the process, negate those of the people around you. Foster trust and confidence.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You mustn't try to proceed prematurely or too quickly today. There is a natural, organic pace you must be willing to adopt.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You will want to avoid high costs today and concentrate on saving money. Use all available resources economically and wisely.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You'll find yourself more willing to do what you can for others today, despite your continued interest in a current key endeavor of your own.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Take the time to finish a project that has been dormant. You will feel a great sense of accomplishment and relief when it's finally done.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — This is a good day to entertain notions you've usually dismissed without a thought. Try experimenting with this new way of thinking.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You can be quite productive today, even while tending to the needs of those who are currently dependent on you.

PREVIOUS PUZZLE SOLVED

Boston a hoppin' joint; marathon run by Red Sox

Adam White
Around the Horn

As the great DeNiro said in The Deerhunter, there's no such thing as a sure thing. There are, however, certain sports phenomena that have become pretty damned predictable. The cornucopia of sports happenings in and around Boston this holiday weekend provided proof of this.

The 103rd running of the Boston Marathon, the world's oldest continuous 26.2-mile race, once again turned Beantown into a frenzied mass of roadblocks and running shoes. The starting field of 12,775 competitors was comprised of runners from all over the world, and ranged from recreational multi-milers trying for a personal best to world-renowned distance specialists seeking to qualify for future Olympic competition.

Half-a-million dollars in prize money may have also provided an incentive for some fiscally-minded fleet-foots. The winner in each major division stood to pocket roughly $80,000 for their efforts.

Once the starting gun split with the sunny 60-degree sky over Hopkinton and the marathon was under way, certain seemingly traditional occurrences began to unfold. The last eight races have been won by Kenyans and defending champion Moses Tanui's early duel with fellow countryman Joseph Chebet appeared to set the stage for a ninth victory for the African country.

Although two-time winner Tanui succumbed to nagging leg cramps and could not finish the race, Chebet seemed to grow stronger with each passing mile as he blazed to victory in 2:09:52, a full 26 seconds ahead of Ecuadorian Silvio Guerra.

"Everybody in the world is trying to catch the Kenyans," said Chebet afterward. Indeed, 10 of the last 12 men to stand atop the Boston Marathon podium have hailed from Kenya.

The women's division also was an exercise in routine, as Ethiopian Fatuma Roba cruised to her third-straight BM win. The reigning Olympic champion had plenty of room to breathe in her decisive victory, as the crowd had to wait nearly two-and-a-half minutes for second place runner Franziska Rochat-Moser of Switzerland to cross the line.

So much for the thrill of the chase.

The drama, however, was readily available across town in the friendly confines of Fenway Park. The home team's 5-0 start this year had many of the Red Sox faithful using words like "revival," yet most educated fans simply smiled and waited for the team's inevitable crash back down to Earth.

That crash came right on cue, courtesy of a 2-4 season- opening home stand.

As if acting from a pre-season script, Boston's offense has all but evaporated in the rising temperatures of April. Granted, Jose Offerman has more than lived up to his billing as a productive slap-hitter who can run the bases, but a "murderer's row" of Troy O'Leary, Mike Stanley, and Trot Nixon doesn't exactly have opposing pitchers shaking in their stirrups.

And while the top four hurlers on the Sox' staff have come out of the gate like thoroughbreds, 5-man Pat Rapp has been just that, "rapped," in his first two starts this year. Rapp has yet to pitch into the fifth inning, and is living testimony to an age-old baseball adage: Two-pitch journeymen who consistently hang breaking balls cannot survive in Fenway park. It's just common sense.

Speaking of survival, the hometown hoopsters are struggling just to keep their heads above water down this shortened season's home stretch. Injuries to their three best players (Antoine Walker, Ron Mercer, and Kenny Anderson out with ankle, back, and hamstring injuries, respectively) have the Celtics throwing a rag-tag ensemble of misfits and role players at their opposition.

The silver lining here is that the remaining men-in-green now have a chance to shine, albeit in losing fashion. Monday's 120-104 loss to Indiana saw career games from Paul Pierce and Vitaly Potapenko, the only two starters Coach Rick Pitino has left in his arsenal.

Pierce's 30 points shattered his previous career-high of 26, set Sunday at Washington. The rookie from Kansas also ripped down 12 boards and dished out six assists, to stay within tail-light distance of Toronto's Vince Carter in the race for NBA Rookie-of-the-Year.

Potapenko, meanwhile, has given merit to Pitino's season- long lament for a legit Celtics big man. "The Ukraine Train" rolled over veteran rafter-man Rik Smits to the tune of 26 points and 16 boards, both career highs, in Monday's loss.

Men's lacrosse to square off with NE rival

UMass, Harvard trying to stop losing streaks

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Chris Campolettano has a chance to help reverse the fortunes of the struggling men's lacrosse team as UMass takes on Harvard this afternoon.

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

If Keith Cynar is smart he'll call his brother.

Cynar, the starting goaltender for the Harvard men's lacrosse team (3-6), has a scouting tool unlike any other to help him prepare to take on Massachusetts (3-6) today at 3 p.m. at Ohiri Field.

Cynar's younger sibling, Justin, patrols between the pipes for the Cornell lacrosse team and played a big role in defeating UMass when the Minutemen travelled to Syracuse, N.Y. for a contest against the Big Red (the game was held in the Carrier Dome because of inclement weather).

Of course, if either Cynar were really daring they could try to tap into an even greater source of information about UMass, namely Minuteman goaltender Chris Campolettano, who hails from Massapequa, N.Y. — the same place the Cynars are from.

Campolettano made 13 saves against Cornell to keep UMass in that game, a 5-4 loss. Today he will anchor the UMass defense against the older brother.

Harvard has a clear-cut challenge ahead of it. Campolettano ranks 12th in the nation in goals against average at 8.45 and 12th in save percentage at .621. Last Saturday against top-ranked Loyola, the sophomore racked up 14 saves.

Campolettano has gotten support on the offensive end, most notably from his classmates. Sophomores account for 64 percent of UMass' goal-production. Chief among that group of underclassmen are attackmen Rich Kunkel and John Madigan, who each have 23 points on the year.

Kunkel has connected on 19 goals and helped on four others, but was shut out of the points column for only the second time this season against Loyola. Madigan, on the other hand, had two goals and a pair of feeds against the Greyhounds to up his season totals to 14 tallies and nine assists.

Both have been part of the Minutemen's potent extra-man offense. That group has connected on 47.4 percent of its opportunities, good for second in the nation. UMass was most successful in that category against Fairfield (6-of-11) and Duke (3-of-4).

On the opposite end of the field, the man-down unit has the best ranking in the country, having allowed opponents to score on only 16 percent (4-of-25) of their chances. None of those four times has come against UMass' last five opponents; and the Minutemen have never allowed more than one man-down goal per game this season.

Today's meeting is the 30th between the two New England rivals. UMass holds a 20-9 edge in the all-time series, which began in 1970. The Crimson won the last meeting, 13-12 in Amherst, on Jim Bevilacqua's game- winning goal with :12 left. UMass did claim the last game in Cambridge, however, defeating Harvard 12-6.

UMass rugby competes nationally

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's rugby club competed at Nationals this past weekend at State College, PA in the round of 16. The club defeated a tough New Mexico State 18-15, but was eventually eliminated by Princeton, 20-3. Princeton had eliminated North Carolina in the first round to reach UMass.

The Minutewomen set the tone when they faced New Mexico State as Danielle Tagg came out and scored the first three points on a penalty kick.

"New Mexico was a challenge for us. In the spring, which isn't our real season, we beat teams like Boston College, UConn and Amherst College and crushed everyone, like, 63- 0," UMass co-captain Jen Linker said. "Danielle Tag did a real good job kicking for us and made the first three points of the game, which set the tone."

The Minutewomen also used a strong contribution from Anne Garrison, who had three trys in the game, to help UMass off the Aggie's. NM St. was able to come back towards the end of the contest, making good on the last couple of trys. However, the Minutewomen held on for the victory. Coach Frank Karuso worried slightly when the Aggies fought back, but his defense held strong.

"Actually, they scored 10 points in the last 10 minutes, and I was a little nervous. We took some soft penalties and they capitalized on them, but we controlled the whole game and our defense really came through," Karuso said.

In the Elite Eight, UMass faced off against Princeton, who is favored to win it all. The Minutewomen hung tough in the first part of the game before being overmatched by a much bigger Princeton club.

"In the first 10 minutes we dominated, but in the scrums we were overmatched. They were a lot bigger then us. Most teams outweigh us by like 100 pounds up front," Linker said.

Women's track finishes second place

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

On Saturday the Massachusetts women's track and field team headed to Storrs, Conn., for the Connecticut Spring Invitational. Once again the Minutewomen (136 points) proved that they belong in the upper echelon of New England programs by placing second in a seven team meet. Only Brown University, with 176 points, topped UMass.

"Brown has one of the best programs in New England. They are consistent year to year and they have depth in all events," UMass Coach Julie LaFrenicre said.

The Minutewomen saw themselves topping regional rival and host UConn (83 points), Atlantic 10 foe Rhode Island (70), Providence College (43), Syracuse University (42) and Boston College (31).

UMass was led by seniors Rose Bryan and Shelanda Irish. Bryan took home first place in the 100 meter hurdles with an ECAC qualifying time of 14.17 seconds. The mark was the best turned in by a Minutewoman thus far this season. Bryan also placed third in the 200 meter dash with a time of 25.54 seconds. Irish placed first in the long jump with a leap of 19-feet-3.25-inches. The leap gave her a spot in the ECACs as

Minutemen baseball to host UVM

Bryan Mazzaferro and the UMass baseball team will be looking to improve on their 17-12 record with a game against Vermont this afternoon.

For the second week in a row the Massachusetts baseball team will carry some momentum into a mid-week non- conference ballgame.

After sweeping three games from Xavier two weekends ago, the Minutemen went out and were handed a 17-8 loss at the hands of Northeastern last Thursday. This afternoon, though, UMass will be hoping for some better results against border rival Vermont, after taking three games from Temple over the weekend.

The Catamounts bring a 15-12 record into today's 3:30 p.m. matchup at Earl Lorden Field against the Minutemen. The affair will also mark the final game of a 10-game homestand in which the Maroon and White are 7-2 thus far.

UMass (17-12, 7-2 Atlantic 10) now sits all alone atop the A-10 Eastern Division as a result of last weekend's sweep of the Owls. The Minutemen came up with solid pitching and some clutch hitting to earn the sweep, highlighted by a two- run rally in the bottom of the ninth inning of Sunday's game that gave UMass a 5-4 win.

Just like any championship-caliber team, the men in maroon on the track squad continue to improve with each successive performance. Massachusetts, hot off of a week during which they placed first at the Connecticut Invitational, once again dominated the field. This time, it was at the Husky Invitational, held at the Reggie Lewis Track and Athletic Center in Dedham.

The invitational this past Saturday, featured the usual from Vic Morency. "Mr. Consistency" was once again a double-winner, and in stunning fashion. He launched the javelin a full 217-feet-8-inches, distancing himself from Tim Lyons of New Hampshire, the second-place fin-

Water polo takes NE; prepares for Easterns

By Lawrence Redford

For the third year in a row, the No. 14 Massachusetts women water polo team won the New England Championship this past weekend. UMass defeated three teams en route to their third consecutive championship.

"The team played really well, it (the tournament) was a warm up for Easterns," said UMass Coach Dan McOsker.

On Saturday, UMass squared off against Wesleyan. The Minutewomen breezed through the match, winning 14-1. UMass overpowered Wesleyan early, jumping out to a 7-0 lead in the first period. This game saw a pair of hat tricks as both All-American Katie Grogan and freshman phenom Anne Dettloff each had three goals.

The semi-final game against Wellesley was very similar to the first round game. UMass bolted out to an early lead, going up 4-0 when the first period came to an end. In this

Hillel honors Israel's birth

Country turns fifty-one on Yom Ha–Atzmaut holiday

MELINDA NORES / COLLEGIAN

Students gather outside of the Hillel House yesterday afternoon to celebrate Yom Ha–Atzmaut, the 51st aniversary of Israel's inception as a nation.

If you happened to to have been traveling down North Pleasant street yesterday evening, you more than likely found it difficult to overlook the considerable gathering on the steps of the Hillel House, consisting of large amounts of food, music and Jewish pride.

What event was successful in drawing so many Jewish students together? Relax. The High Holy Days did not come early this year. Instead, Wednesday marked the fifty–first birthday of the State of Israel, otherwise known as Yom Ha– Atzmaut.

Israel's birthday party is an event planned exhaustingly by Hillel's Israeli Independence Day committee. Members David Arfa, Debbie Kaplan, Morry Korkinow, Alison Rosen and Tanya Taylor met weekly throughout the year to coordinate for what is one of Hillel's most widely attended and publicized events.

The celebration began with a free falafel dinner, and proceeded to feature performances by Dan Kapner and Nat Ungar, and speeches by students. The event offered an excellent chance to learn more about travel and study in Israel, as well as featuring a free raffle and Israeli music.

Many students took advantadge of the festivities to explore and express their sentiments as to what Israel has meant to their identity as Jews.

Clinton responds to Colorado shooting

By Sandra Sobieraj
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton struggled from 1,500 miles away yesterday to ease the horror and sorrow of Columbine High School. Cabinet officials mobilized what help they could offer. The president weighed making a visit to the Littleton, Colo., community like those he made to Oklahoma City after the 1995 bombing and in June to Oregon's Thurston High, the last school shooting to burst into national headlines.

"All of us are struggling to understand exactly what happened and why. There is a deep desire to comfort the grieving and counsel the children," the president said.

By moving a work session with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Clinton made room in today's schedule to visit northern Virginia's T.C. Williams High School and hear students' concerns about school violence. Aides were looking at the president's schedule next week for a possible visit with the students, parents and teachers of suburban Denver.

Both Clinton and Vice President Al Gore, as a gesture of respect for the community's grief, canceled appearances at political fund-raising events yesterday.

White House officials were looking for an appropriate way for the president personally to comfort Littleton, press secretary Joe Lockhart said.

"The president wants to do what's best for the local community," Lockhart said. "We are especially sensitive to not causing any disruption or distraction to the ongoing efforts there."

Meanwhile, Clinton said the relative calm in the day after the gunfire inside Columbine was a good time for parents everywhere to reassure children of their safety — and "to take this moment once again to hammer home to all the children of America that violence is wrong."

He also beseeched parents to "ask what else they can do to shield our children from violent images and experiences that warp young perceptions and obscure the consequences of violence — to show our children by the power of our own example how to resolve conflicts peacefully."

The president said nothing about guns or gun control.

Lockhart said later that Clinton's support for tightly restricting youth access to guns is well known — but not much was immediately known

A deeper look at the issue of the admissions policy

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Many students have spoken about the recent admissions policy revision using chants and signs but three students gave deeper insights on the issue with individual views.

"I don't think the end is near. I've seen some battles we've won, but the war is far from over," said Zatcha Fuentes, a sophomore exercise science major who was part of the steering committee for the Task Force for Equal Opportunity and Access for All People.

The announcement was made two months ago that in the three categories of applicants that use race when considering admissions, race would be a less significant factor. It would be one of many factors considered, on par with criteria like special talents and the applicant's essay.

Once word spread of the change, students protested it and outlined what they wanted the University of Massachusetts administration to do to increase the number of Asian, Latino African, Native, American (ALANA) students at UMass.

Three of those organizers were Fuentes, Kiya Stokes, former Task Force steering committee member and graduate student in labor studies, and Jeff Belizaire, Black Student Union president and a sophomore honors student majoring in African American studies and computer graphics.

The three took similar avenues on their way to joining others in forming the student Task Force.

Fuentes and Belizaire said they became part of the protest movement after Resa Singleton, student coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) and some other students, told them of the admissions policy change. Fuentes said Singleton "distributed information to all of us to set up [the steering committee]." She said in the beginning it was just a "core group of students" who got together to organize the Task Force. "You have no other choice but to be involved."

"Some students were really concerned with what happened [and] we got together... Nelson Acosta from ALANA Affairs knew all of us as individuals and kind of got us together," Stokes said.

But getting things off the ground proved to be difficult.

"There wasn't any type of organization in place to organize and mobilize people. [It was] really hard trying to get started. A lot of people had a lot of complaints," he said.

When we "first started all this we all had a common goal [but] different opinions... now we've settled that and everybody is working at it the way they can," Fuentes said.

As the organization grew, so did the responsibilities of those involved. With the meetings, organizing and rallies that come with running a protest movement, the three full– time students said they are able to keep up their morale.

I "just have something to look forward to everyday. Adversity is like chocolate cake to me," Belizaire said. "I'm having the time of my life... I've really learned more out of class than inside. All this stuff we're doing as a community we really don't learn in class."

"You don't get discouraged. You get frustrated," Fuentes said. "You want to do all that you can for [the cause] but we're also students. Sometimes you don't have a life."

"I definitely do [get discouraged]," said Stokes, who has been one of the most prominent individuals on the forefront of the student movement. Stokes said he will be less involved in the protests from now on so he can focus on his studies and also give others, who will be at UMass after he leaves in December, a chance to lead. "There's some really [good] leaders, people who have more time to devote to what happening... It was a tough decision to kind of take more of a back seat role. I like to be hands on," he said."I really don't see my role going back to way it was."

But despite feeling the strain of the past two months, Stokes said there

Allies intensify air campaign

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — With NATO missiles striking Belgrade by night and day, the first batch of Apache attack helicopters touched down in Albania yesterday as the Western allies intensified their air campaign against Yugoslavia.

The arrival of the long-awaited U.S. anti-tank helicopters represents a significant boost in NATO's capability to destroy tanks and troops of Yugoslav forces blamed for atrocities against Kosovo Albanian civilians. It wasn't known when the helicopters would go into action.

In Brussels, NATO spokesman Jamie Shea said the alliance, bolstered by extra aircraft, is hitting double the number of targets it struck during the first two weeks of the campaign, now entering its fifth week.

Early Wednesday, NATO missiles slammed into a high-rise building which includes offices of President Slobodan Milosevic's ruling Socialist Party and eight broadcast stations, one of them owned by Milosevic's daughter. A senior Yugoslav official called the strikes part of a "genocidal flying circus" perpetrated by NATO. Hours later, NATO launched a daytime strike in the capital area, severely damaging a railway bridge over the Sava River a few miles west of Belgrade. Air raid sirens sounded again before dawn Thursday in Belgrade and Serbia's second largest city Novi Sad. Strong explosions could be heard in both cities.

The state news agency Tanjug reported "very strong detonations" early Thursday near the Batajnica military airfield just north of Belgrade, where dense smoke could be seen rising. The Beta news agency said about 20 missiles struck the airfield and that a "pillar of flame" could be seen there.

Tanjug also reported an attack on the central Serb town of Valjevo, which has been frequently targeted in recent weeks. Tanjug also said the missiles hit a compound near the Kosovo town of Djakovica containing Serb refugees from fighting this decade in Bosnia and Croatia, killing at least 10 people and injuring 16. There was no way to independently verify the report. The strikes near Belgrade and the arrival of the Apache helicopters signaled NATO's

SGA debates whether or not UM sports can give credits

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Should student athletes receive credit for playing a varsity sport? Last night at the Student Government Association's meeting the question came up. President Jeff Howe and Trustee elect Seth Avakian presented a motion that would recommend that faculty senate pass a motion that would give student athletes physical education credits for playing a varsity sport. The SGA does not have the power to pass this motion, and that is why it is a recommendation to the faculty senate.

President Howe spoke for the motion saying that although most people think athletes get special privileges it is not true for a lot of them. "Most of them aren't on scholarship. They represent our school and create a pride for students," said Howe.

The way credits would be given is unclear, and would be determined by faculty senate. The recommendation is for a student who plays a varsity sport to be given physical education credit, athletes would still be required to fulfill their general education requirements (Geneds), and they would still have to complete all their course work in their major and minor.

Senators had concerns as to whether this will be beneficial practice. Senator Daniel Morrissey from Southwest Residential Area raised a question concerning powers far greater than UMass. "Will this will break National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) regulations?" According to UMass Athletic Director Bob Marcum, "No, as long as it is recognized as accredited by the institution."

Senator Paul Ferro from Commuter Area fought against the motion saying that a number of these students are given scholarships and a lot of students do things on campus that they do not receive credit for, like participate in Registered Student Organizations, (RSO's). He also said, "Were a institution of higher learning not the minor league for hockey. We shouldn't lower academic standards. They get tutors, scholarships and other compensations — they play for the love of the game."

Senator Asif Sayani from Orchard Hill Residential area spoke for the motion saying that although the basketball team didn't do well this year they still brought in a lot revenue, worked hard, and the students were behind them. In the end, the motion failed.

The motions that were presented throughout the rest of the night passed. Senator Billard from Commuter Area presented a motion to organize a committee to work on the part of the constitution that deals with house councils. One student will be appointed from every residential area to represent the area.

A motion was passed concerning the meter parking located on Fearing Street, the Southwest Horseshoe, and by Franklin Dining Commons. Trustee elect Avakian, and President Howe want the hour that metered parking starts being enforced changed from 8 a.m. to 10 a.m. The reasoning behind it is that there is no demand for those spots in the early hours and students who park there overnight are forced to wake up earlier to move their vehicles.

Holiday for daughters celebrated at UMass

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

When the Ms. Magazine Foundation For Women started Take Our Daughters to Work Day in 1993, their goal was to create a program bolstering self–esteem In New York City's adolescent girls.

Seven years later the program boasts nationwide participation. The University of Massachusetts celebrates Take Our Daughters to Work Day today with special activities planned throughout the day.

Hosted by the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women and sponsored in part by CVS Pharmacy and the UMass Alumni Association, Take Our Daughters to Work Day will give young women in the community a taste of life at UMass.

Ann Carr, Director of Administrative Data and a member of the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women, said UMass has been participating in the event since the second year of its inception.

"I think [Take Our Daughters to Work Day] tends to be very positive. A lot of employees bring their children. There is going to be more community involvement this year — we asked the Girl Scouts to come," she said.

Carr also said the event, geared towards 9–15 year old girls, aims to intervene at a crucial point in young women's lives, where they often lose confidence and slip in their studies.

"This was an idea introduced to show them various, possible role–models," she said.

The theme of this year's Take Our Daughters to Work Day is "The Future is Me." Jamila Wideman, WNBA Los Angeles Sparks point–guard and Amherst native, and her father, UMass English professor John Edgar Wideman, are the national spokespeople for the event. They have been featured in promotional campaigns across the country.

According to the Take Our Daughters to Work website (http://ms.foundation.org/) a June 1998 Roper Starch Worldwide poll revealed over 33 million adults said they or their spouses participated in the program that year.

Some of the activities being sponsored on campus include a breakfast reception and information fair from 8:30–10:00 a.m., featuring Elaine were high points overall.

"That first major rally we had, when people went to the Admissions Building. To me that was a high point [people were] energized and [participating] particularly from the ALANA community," Stokes said.

Some goals Stokes said he hopes are ultimately reached, are to have the admissions process examined "so changes can be made to make it more fair, more inclusive to minorities and low income students." Also a University statement of commitment to race based affirmative action.

The administration said they are "committed to affirmative action but [they] reduced the role race plays in admissions. [You] can't reduce the role race plays in admissions and say you're committed to affirmative action," Stokes said.

In order to achieve their goals, many different actions need to be taken, Stokes said.

"Some people think we should be doing more, some think we're doing as much as we can," Stokes said. It should be "a combination of [action]. Not building take overs but direct action [like] student protests [and] continuing an open dialogue with the University."

Expanding the protesting and raising awareness of the issue among those that will be thinking about it next, is critical to Fuentes.

We should "definitely take this from a campus based thing to a national thing...so all high school students in the surrounding area know it's going on," Fuentes said. "Those are the people that need to know what's going on. They're the ones this will seriously affect. We're already here."

Chancellor David K. Scott is in the process of setting up a task force to examine the admissions policy, but Fuentes feels it isn't enough to cover the issue.

"To me it's like a little hand-aid," she said. "I think it would work if they gave us more credit."

Fuentes is concerned that the decision of who will be on the task force may not be done communally with students only choosing student members, faculty only choosing faculty members and so on.

I "would like it to be a consensus of the whole group of who is chosen... you want all of them to be unified together [in order to work well together]."

Belizaire, wants to see a new admissions policy instituted that would set a trend the rest of the country could follow.

The "goals of a new admissions policy [should be] to maximize the ALANA recruitment, ALANA retention and admissions in [the future], that would be legal" and set a precedent, Belizaire said.

But what action to take to achieve those aims, Stokes said, should include all avenues from, action to education, Amherst to Boston.

"Some people don't understand, it's not an "either-or situation," he said.

"Anything is possible anything can happen something may happen this week something could happen next semester," Belizaire said. But people with "more information tend to be more radical."

"Nobody wants to take over... the administration [should] not think that it's not a possibility," Fuentes said. "If things come to a point where students feel we're not being heard [a take over is possible]. We're trying to avoid that at all costs...we want them to work with us."

Both University trustees as well as Scott, faculty and student leaders have been meeting to discuss the admissions policy and ways to appease both sides, but the students said they are waiting to see what comes of the meetings before calling them a success.

"It is encouraging. It's good the trustees are here when people are pretty serious about making a change. I'm hopeful yet still very cautious," Stokes said adding he hopes Scott's task force is productive.

"I'm not totally satisfied yet," Belizaire said. It's "too early to tell if things look encouraging or not."

While some students have been focusing on organizing protests, meetings and educating students about the admissions policy, Fuentes doesn't feel that those that haven't been should be looked down upon.

"Some people can't be here all the time. They need to dedicate themselves to academics. I commend these students. You're going to be another number who didn't make it [if you are sacrificing grades to protest]. Everyone involved is taking their studies very seriously. I don't think we should downplay students not in the forefront," Fuentes said.

Chinese steal American nuclear weaponry info

By John Diamond
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Through aggressive spying, China obtained classified information on a variety of U.S. nuclear weapons, making it possible for Beijing to modernize its arsenal in the next few years, U.S. intelligence officials told Congress on yesterday. In a long-awaited damage assessment, administration officials disclosed for the first time that China gathered classified information not just on the W-88 warhead and the neutron bomb but on "several" modern U.S. warheads.

"China obtained by espionage classified U.S. nuclear weapons information that probably accelerated its program to develop future nuclear weapons," according to a declassified version of the assessment.

But the intelligence team said China also gained some valuable weapons information in open venues such as public conferences and scientific exchanges.

President Clinton, who was briefed on the findings yesterday, ordered a review to assess potential vulnerability to espionage beyond the U.S. nuclear weapons laboratories.

"Measures to protect sensitive nuclear weapons information must be constantly scrutinized," Clinton said in a statement.

Chinese espionage at U.S. weapons labs developed into a political storm for Clinton as Republicans accused his administration of being lax in responding to the FBI's initial concerns in 1995. The issue followed on the heels of allegations that the administration promoted commercial satellite exports that allowed Beijing to improve its ballistic missiles.

Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Richard Shelby said the briefing Wednesday made it clear that Chinese spying continued into the Clinton administration, something that the president in the past has denied knowledge of.

"It confirms my worst fears," Shelby (R-Ala.) said of the damage assessment. "We made it easy for the Chinese because of weak security at our national labs... We took too long to find out what was going on and we the president in the past has denied knowledge of.

Rep. Norm Dicks (D-Wash.) ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said that while the report "demonstrates a terrible intelligence failure" by the United States, the long-term security implications are less clear.

about the weapons used at Columbine.

More than a dozen federal agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms focused on tracing the arsenal — two sawed-off shotguns, one handgun and one carbine, the White House said — to determine who licensed them, and how and where the teen-age suspects got hold of such firepower.

"We must cut off teen-agers' easy access to guns and drugs and work to change a popular culture that glorifies violence and mayhem," Gore said in a speech at New York's Ellis Island.

"The world's eyes are upon us and our children's eyes are upon us too." Officials from the departments of Education, Treasury, Justice and Health and Human Services and from the Federal Emergency Management Administration held a morning-after conference call on what aid they could give Jefferson County, where Columbine High is located. Education Secretary Richard Riley consulted the local school superintendent by phone.

Attorney General Janet Reno was to fly to Denver and meet privately today with law enforcement officials and victim-services providers, said Justice Department spokesman Myron Marlin.

"What we must do now is learn from this tragedy and use the lessons to help prevent future tragedies," Reno said at a Minneapolis appearance yesterday. "Although it comes as little comfort at a time like this, we must remember that schools are still among the safest places for America's children."

resolve to escalate the conflict until Milosevic accepts a Western-dictated peace plan for Kosovo, a province of Yugoslavia's republic Serbia with an overwhelmingly Albanian population.

Apaches are among the most lethal tank-killers in the NATO arsenal, each armed with 16 Hellfire missiles, 70 mm rockets and a 30 mm cannon that fires 625 rounds per minute.

Their use in combat would also mark the U.S. Army's entry into a conflict which has been waged by the Air Force and Navy. NATO says the Apaches could be sent into Kosovo by next week.

"There's of course risk to us," Army Capt. Mark Arden of Washington, D.C., said in the Albanian capital, Tirana. "But the risks to the Serbs, I would say, are great."

The Apaches are expected to be used initially against Serb targets in southwestern Kosovo. Ethnic Albanian rebels fighting for an independent Kosovo have regrouped there after Serbs drove them from many of their traditional strongholds.

International monitors said 18 rebels were wounded and two killed in a second straight day of heavy fighting yesterday in southwestern Kosovo near the Albanian border.

As the air campaign escalated, alliance spokesmen said NATO blasted more than 20 targets early yesterday.

Besides the bridge outside Belgrade, two others over the commercially important Danube River also were wrecked around Novi Sad, Serbia's second-largest city. NATO says it is targeting the bridges to prevent the army from resupplying its forces in Kosovo. Yugoslav officials expressed outrage at the pre-dawn strike on the 23-story Socialist Party building in Belgrade, calling it a purely civilian target.

Mission to Israel, read from her journal entry written on the last night of the trip. Rosen was moved by her visit to the Western Wall, and was also prompted to question her status as a woman in traditional Judaism. For her, the trip provided a "connection to Israel as a Jewish person."

The evening was also used as an opportunity to inform the Jewish community as to how events in Israel affect Jews in the diaspora.

Morry Korkinow, Jewish Residential Area Programmer for Northeast, spoke about his own experience spending six months in Israel. He arrived a mere three days before the assasination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. The country was brought together in shock in the days following Rabin's death, helping to alleviate some of Korkinow's nervousness about beginning public school. According to Korkinow, the death of Rabin "unified all Jews, regardless of whether they were religious or secular." He also equated the event to another infamous tragedy, the death of President John F. Kennedy. He stated, "Every Jew in the diaspora remembers where they were when Rabin died."

Junior Natty Yagudin used her experience as a drill sergeant in the Israeli army to facilitate a small group discussion. She emphasized the importance of the army to the social and cultural existence of the country, stating that "The army is what makes Israel." Yagudin also pointed out the presence of soldiers on the streets of Jerusalem and Tel-Aviv, attributing them with making the country "feel safe."

The evening concluded with a performance by Kolot, Hillel's a cappella group, featuring Shira Hutt, Stephanie Gordon, Sarah Danzig and Dan Kapner. The group also led everyone in singing "Hatikvah", Israel's national anthem.

Yom Ha-Atzmaut festivities will continue on Saturday night, beginning at 8 p.m. at the Top of the Campus restaurant, where Israeli rock band Yom Hadash will perform, in addition to refreshments and more celebration of Jewish pride! For more information, contact Hillel at 549- 1710.

Dominican gov't welcomes former guard of Castro

By Jose Monegro
Associated Press

SANTO DOMINGO, Dominican Republic — One of Fidel Castro's bodyguards defected during the Cuban leader's recent visit to the Dominican Republic, high-ranking sources in the Dominican government said yesterday.

The sources, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity, said Capt. Lazaro de Betancourt sought asylum at the U.S. Embassy Sunday after a summit of the Association of Caribbean States.

Spokesmen at the embassy and the State Department in Washington would not comment on the reports.

"I'm not in a position to comment at this time," embassy spokesman Michael Stanton said in Santo Domingo. A State Department spokesman said he could neither confirm nor deny the report. The captain was the second-in-command of a circle of bodyguards who protect Castro, the Dominican sources said. They added he is being housed in a U.S. diplomatic residence in Santo Domingo. A senior official in the Dominican National Investigations Bureau said Dominican officials were proceeding with much caution because the Cuban was being protected by the U.S. Embassy, which he said also was in a difficult situation since the would-be defector was not in U.S. territory.

Post–traumatic MCAT disorder

Whew, I'm done with the MCAT! And it's about damn time. Oh, don't worry — this isn't going to be an article all about my problems with the MCAT. In fact, part of this piece is about what I've gained from the entire experience, and the rest... well, it just wouldn't be my style if I didn't have some snide, sarcastic remarks.

Gary Mendese

Before I begin, if anyone out there is thinking, "I don't give a damn about the MCAT. I'm going to be taking the GRE," or anything else like that, then save it. Everyone in the English department talks about his major, so it's my turn now.

Anyway, in case you don't know, the MCAT has three numerically graded sections (from 1–15): physical sciences (physics and general chemistry), biological sciences (biology and organic chemistry) and verbal reasoning. Then there is a writing sample that is given a letter grade (graded from J-T. Don't ask — I guess they just like to keep things interesting). In total, there are 5 hours and 45 minutes of testing over an eight-hour day, and this test can make or break your medical school application.

Given all of this, even a lobotomy patient could see that there is a lot of prep work that needs to go into this test. So, like most students, I took a prep course: Kaplan. The rest of my class and I studied our tails off for this exam for three months, and last Saturday was D-Day. We put our skills to the test, and hopefully we aced the exam.

Because I have spent most of my time at Kaplan — which I would highly recommend, by the way... my score improved dramatically throughout the course, and they taught me all of the skills that were essential for the exam — I have learned so much more about the sciences, and what the words "dedication" and "determination" truly mean. At several points in my life, I questioned whether or not I wanted to become a doctor, but seeing how much time that I put into preparing for this exam, I realized there was no other thing in this world I'd rather be.

I think it was a maturing experience and I'm a different person now that it's over. I've learned to concentrate more and I've gained a more in-depth understanding of the pre-med courses I've taken in the past. For instance, I learned that there really is no such thing as an electron (that's right... your teachers lied to you), and I learned that horribly written journal entries can in fact be published; they can appear on the verbal reasoning section of the MCAT. And I mean horribly written! It's bad enough that anyone would ever become a philosophy major, but when you turn the shape of a maple leaf into a moral dilemma as to "why we are here", then you should be slapped with a two-by–four.

Well, with that last comment, let's move away from the positive things about the MCAT, and head toward some free-flowing hostility!

Yes, I did learn a great deal from the entire experience, but damn! I forgot about the rest of the freaking world. Because I was such an MCAT–ite, I didn't even know about the wonderful stuff that was going on in Kosovo; that is, until Paul Teyes wrote about it. Also, while sheltered from the rest of the world, I guess I missed the news that some scientists grew an ear on the back of a mouse and that his daughter actually attends UMass!. I vaguely remember something about a dress and a cigar, too, but it probably wasn't very important... hey, is Haley's Comet coming around soon?

Didn't I see Britney Spears sticking a ticket on some car?...and she had plumber's crack!

This stuff might not sound like much to you, but I feel like I've missed out on a lot. I mean, when did they close the porn shop?! And why?! Don't even try to tell me that they went out of business — not with people like my roommate around. And who the hell is Britney Spears?! Does she work in Whitmore?

No, wait a minute! I know where I've seen her. She's the one that I saw sticking a ticket on some car that had just been in an accident and was on fire. And she had plumber's crack! Boy, was she dedicated to her job: with a chocolate frosted doughnut in one hand and a nifty little computer in the other, that parking service lady (with drool on the side of her mouth) leaped over six cars — with the help of a cannon, that is — determined to give that guy a ticket. Now I know why everyone is obsessed with that Spears girl... and what a hottie.

Well, I guess my memory is gradually coming back to me. I know I have learned many things about both science and life itself because of the MCAT, but unfortunately, I missed a lot of world events and it'll probably take a long time before I catch up with society again. But at least I'll be going to medical school, right? I don't want to knock the admissions process, but all that studying and hermit life seems a bit much to me. Oh well, it's not worth complaining about.

Anyway, I'm off to the drive-in... I hear there's a double feature playing today.

Fear of philanthropy

Volunteering. Four syllables, twelve letters and loads of fear. With future jobs and career opportunities fast upon us, most students are scrambling to fill their resumes with activities deemed conscientious and caring. One such endeavor often overlooked is community service.

Jacqueline Wiley

Somewhere long ago, when meanings were being handed down, responsibility, continuity and commitment were added to the description of volunteering. Now don't rush home and whip out Webster's in a desperate attempt to prove me wrong, this definition is not in print. No, it can only be found in a much more personal place — on the minds of most everyone.

Students today are so afraid to donate some time from their already too full schedules because they fear having to make a commitment to whatever organization they choose to support. This is not only incorrect; it is an ignorant way of looking at community service.

Though there are many programs which offer one time deals in the volunteering category, I shall speak of only one. On Saturday, April 24th, students and faculty alike can help out for one day, making a difference for so many in need. MassPIRG, in conjunction with ViVA, will hold a Hunger Cleanup/Into Amherst this Saturday. The event is held annually to help raise money for victims of hunger and homelessness. Volunteers kick off their morning with a rally beside Sweetzer Park, before venturing out to a pre-assigned destination and helping to make a difference. Helping out at shelters, picking up trash, watching children, cleaning rivers and working at soup kitchens are only some of the tasks needing volunteers.

The entire day is a fundraising event in which volunteers are encouraged to fill pledge sheets based on how many hours they will work. Fashioned after a walk–a–thon, money will be raised through volunteers and from anyone willing to donate for this cause. All proceeds will be split among three causes. They are a local shelter, the National Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness and an international relief fund.

Many of you reading this are probably thinking you're too busy to help out the community. Or perhaps you aren't busy but you would rather sleep until 2 p.m. than have 5 hours of community service completed by then. For you, the skeptics, I offer the following: tonight when you crawl into bed, at whatever hour it may be, and you nestle your head into the pillows, pulling the blankets tight, think of the 600,000 children in Massachusetts alone who are living below the poverty level. If you are able to close your eyes and feel the waves of indifference rushing over you, try to remember that 3 million people are homeless and do not have a bed at all, nevermind one at home and one at school like you. Hungry and/or homeless people are no different than you or I. They do not choose their lot in life and are not faced with many other options to better it.

It is easy to say you should help, that you want to and will do so the next time, but just as simple is to volunteer 5 hours of one day. That really is all it takes.

I know where many others and myself will be this Saturday from 9–2 p.m. We won't be sleeping or thinking about ourselves, we will be helping others and in doing so bettering whom we are. The truth is, volunteering isn't just about giving something away. It is about feeling in return the sense of pride in doing things for someone else.

Over my head

"Remember to test the water before you dive into it," mother used to say. "Only fools jump into shallow water."

I can remember pondering about how overly–cautious older people can be. Diving into that black, unknown surface, I was unstoppable. With an attempted double somersault, pretending to be some famous Olympian, I would hit the water with a splash & a stomachache was the only scar that was left of my attempt at heroism.

Jason Trenkle

I have learned a lot about diving off shallow ends — and relationships.

"Women are a lot like water," she once said. "You need to see how calm the water is before you attempt to surf or swim it."

If she was right, then I'm still struggling to keep my head above the surface. I have not been the average "Fabio" when it comes to women and trying to understand them. And then of course, I really don't see how women can understand us.

No offense guys, but honestly we are half–shaven, "three– legged", sex–thriving cut–throats when it comes to understanding women. A girl is like a road to the average male. Guys want to drive their Porsche all over it and then after they've driven from point A to point B, they decide to find another road to drive all over.

Last weekend, a friend and I went and saw the movie "Never Been Kissed." It's an outright "chick–flick" and I thought it sucked. She called me insensitive for not being able to appreciate a romantic film. Maybe, to an extent, I'm insensitive, and don't know love when I see it. Maybe I am stuck driving all over Route 9 looking for Amherst.

The best thing about going undercover as a journalist is being able to cloak your real self and pretend to be someone else. It's sort of like me with relationships. I'm very shy when I talk to people of the opposite sex. So I decided to dress up as one. This summer, the camp I worked at had a dress–up day. It just so happened I had a crush on one of the counselors. In an attempt to display my more feminine side to please her, I dressed up as a woman. Aside from the fact that it was quite uncomfortable in some regions, I got to "cover" my real self in a cloak of disguise, and it enabled me to open up to the female counselor.

In a way, we all go undercover to test the "unexplored territories" in attempts to understand the fine line that separates us.

While it is a mystery what spurs us on to do those crazy things for kicks or for the occasional crush, it is obvious males and females have different ways of expressing love.

One afternoon, a friend and I were walking back from the mall when we saw a girl that caught our attention. We both looked at each other with that look only guys can understand. After talking to her, we decided to follow her. We followed her back to Orchard Hill before we decided to make it appear coincidental that we lived in the same dorm. We struck up a conversation and hit it off. Now, the girl and I are good friends.

Now it appears we could easily have gone up to her directly, but obviously that would have been too easy.

When I was young, I used to fantasize that I was "one of them good ol' boys" on the Dukes of Hazzard and pretended to ride around in the General Lee saving my true loves from danger. The best part was not resolving the conflict at the end so it would be continued the next week. It would have been too simple to have the guy get the girl. I've noticed this a lot with people. For most, the easiest way to get somewhere is usually the wrong way.

Even when I'm walking through campus, I will observe the unique nature of men and women. Women will not make it obvious they are looking at a guy. Men, on the other hand, will stare at the girl to see if she's looking back as some sign. And because each of us are trying to not make it obvious, it is amazing how relationships even get started.

I can remember when, during a track meet in high school, I saw a girl that took my breath away. She was incredible and had such a beautiful complexion I couldn't take my eyes off her. She turned around and... yessss... our eyes met. I started to advance towards her and just as we were about to meet, one of my female teammates walked up to me and in a sexy tone said, "Jason I had such a great time last night." The whole day, I regretted having walked up to her at that moment. Sometimes it's better when you don't know the end to a movie.

Maybe it's a good thing I don't understand what sparks a relationship between two people. Men and women differ so much and yet it is these differences that are so complementary. For me, I am still attempting to tread the water that's over my head.

Don't sweat the small stuff...

During the next couple of minutes please don't laugh. Please don't even think about anything amusing. Just think about the 25 families who are without loved ones as a result of the massacre in a Colorado high school on Tuesday. While most of us were going about our day whining about a test or complaining that Wednesday would be a Monday schedule hundreds of kids were living in terror as their lives were in the hands of some insane lunatics. As I write this all of the facts are yet to be uncovered. The one thing I do know, however, is that as you read this you are alive and those kids in Colorado are not.

I'm sorry if this is dreary and depressing, but this issue must be addressed. The issue that I'm speaking of isn't violence in schools. Something should be done about this rash of massacres that has occurred throughout this country over the past couple of years, but like most of you I don't have any answers. The issue is the frailty of life. One minute these children were full of life and vibrancy, and seconds later they were lifeless on the floor. It is awful to think about, but then again do we think about it?

We've become so unfazed by violence, killing, death and dying that these incidents don't have any real lasting effect on most of us. We just hear the numbers; 25 dead and 14 injured. It's come to the point when these numbers are just another statistic, like Barry Sanders averaging 4.5 yards per carry or Mark McGuire hitting a home run once every ten at–bats. We have become numb to these horrific incidents. I don't know if it is because of the movies, television or Tupac. Truthfully, I don't care why we have become so numb — I just care that we escape this numbness.

In a couple of weeks this incident will be a faint memory. Over the next couple of days we'll hear about it nonstop, and then it will mostly disappear. Everyone will compare the different statistics about the massacre from all of the news magazine shows. Everyone will ask, "How could these kids do such a thing?" and "How in the world could they ever get so much ammunition?"

Everyone from the ages of 19 to 100 will say, "These kinds of things never happened when I was in school."

Then everyone who lives in a town where nothing like this has ever happened will say, "Something like that could never happen in my town." Then we'll all go back to forgetting.

As time goes by we can't help forgetting the past. However, I believe that we should learn something and try to change our ways because of this massacre and all of the other terrible things that we know happen everyday, but go without news coverage. We are lucky. I don't care if you have the flu, you totaled your car, you ripped your new Abercrombie jeans or if you failed a test: you're still lucky to be alive.

Everyday that you wake up you have an opportunity to do so much. Please don't brush all of this off like it is a cliche. I mean it. Each day could be the last day you have to talk to your grandparents. Each day you live could be the day you grow too far apart from a friend to just pick up the phone and see how they are doing without it being awkward.

Dan Viens

Each precious day holds so much, but there are very few of us who truly seize these days. Too many of us spend our days worrying about silly things that aren't really that important and don't have a serious effect on our lives. Too much time is spent sweating the small stuff. This waste of time is disrespectful to the people who aren't lucky enough to still be living their life.

Now I want you to laugh and be happy. Be happy because as of right now you still have the opportunity to right past wrongs. You can still honor those people who had their gift taken from them by valuing your life. You hold your future right in the palm of your hand. Your future could last another 10 minutes or another 70 years.

Do yourself some favors. If there is someone in your family or a friend who you haven't talked to in a while because of some differences you have then just call them. Try to clear the air. People who you've known for a while and people who really know you get rarer everyday. When you go home today call your mom and dad. Tell them you love them and ask how they are doing. Learn as much from your grandparents as possible.

If you can find your boyfriend or girlfriend, kiss them and give them a little gift, not as an apology, but because you are fortunate and happy. After all of this just look around and remember that you are lucky.

I don't know if all of you stopped reading this because it wasn't funny or if you think that I have been too sensitive and whiny, but what I do know is that too many important things get taken for granted in and including life. So please stop worrying about things like whether or not your pants are "in" or why so–and–so said something in a certain tone of voice. Just help yourself make good things happen. Above all, remember those 25 families and how lucky you are to just be reading this.

Can Rock & Roll be saved?

Radio killed the rock star

Radio sucks. MTV sucks even harder. (Well, at least it makes us less picky). The sorry–ass state of rock music today leaves us to ponder one question: "Is rock and roll dead?" The answer is no, it's not dead... it just deserves to die.

Kevin Monahan

There was a time when rock and roll was a type of music that made a difference. It was considered dangerous. It shocked some people and passed others off. It was music that made some sort of difference. Now, it's hard to differentiate from one bland and generic band to the next. Corporate rock, radio and lowest–common–denominator marketing has contributed to rock's demise.

When was it interesting? Yes, it did have a rebirth in the late–'80s, but that was just a momentary blip on the radar screen. Rock music came to its pinnacle. After the peace/love hippie rock movement, Glam–rock was born. Artists like Brian Eno, Iggy Pop and the one–and–only David Bowie pushed peoples' buttons that had never been

Lyrical spinstress Liz Phair to play at Mt. Holyoke

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

Exiled in Guyville, but making a stop in the area, Liz Phair will be playing a show at Mt. Holyoke College tomorrow night at 8 p.m.

After playing two packed shows at the end of last year in Boston, Phair will finally be playing closer to home for Valley residents who won't have to travel across state for what is sure to be a great show.

Last year's whitechocolatespacegg rose above all the hype that surrounded the sexually frank lyrics of her earlier work, proving that her songwriting skills go beyond simple controversy. It was an album almost four years in the making. Songs were written, thrown away, rerecorded. R.E.M. was even brought in to record some of the music, but their efforts only show up on one track, "Fantasize." The long work paid off, though, as whitechocolatespacegg turned out to be the most pleasant surprise of the year.

While motherhood and marriage seems to have tamed Phair's lyrics a bit, her songs have not lost their edge. Instead, she has dug deeper, talking about the fears of growing old and growing unhappy. "Perfect World" talks about the desire to be "cool, tall, vulnerable and luscious." The most revealing song is "Go On Ahead," where she questions how far her marriage will go with all the stress of parenthood. "It's about the feeling you have when your relationship with your husband is strained to the max because of other responsibilities," she told Details in the October 1998 issue. "It makes me cringe."

In October, Phair wowed the crowd at the Avalon, playing songs off of whitechocolatespacegg, but she devoted a lot of time to selections from her first two albums, Exile in Guyville and Whip-smart. The most surprising thing about the show was the confidence she showed on stage, especially considering the fact that she didn't tour previously because of her stage fright. But on that night, Phair owned the crowd and made the audience wonder what exactly she had worried about.

David Mead will open the show. Liz Phair will play the Chapin Auditorium at Mt Holyoke College tomorrow night at 8 p.m. Tickets are $15 for general admission and can be purchased at the Northampton Box Office. For the Record in Amherst, About Music in Greenfield and Tix Unlimited at UMass.

■ dead

If it is dead, historians will look back to find the official end to rock 'n' roll in MTV's Spring Break marathons that get replayed well into Winter Break. If it did not kill rock 'n' roll, it at least put a shiv between its shoulder blades. Once upon a time, Elvis Presley's hips were too dangerous to be shown on TV. Now, we have to watch Eminem grind with disgusted swimsuit models while he lip syncs to his new song. What's dangerous about that? It's more disturbing than anything else.

There was a time when music could do the impossible. It could toe the line between dumb and smart, fun and important. It spoke to masses without necessarily appealing to the lowest common denominator. It seems, and maybe I'm wrong, that there isn't much out there that has the ability to give people hope and visions and unity and everything that's romantic and idealized about music. Maybe there is music like that. But it's hip hop.

"We learned more from the three-minute record, baby Than we'd ever learned in school"
— Bruce Springsteen
"No Surrender"

But there is hope for rock 'n' roll, a thin blip on the EKG meter. Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band have started touring again after almost a decade apart. And if the reviews from the first European dates are any indication, a new generation can look forward to what has been described as part revival, part circus.

If there was ever an artist who believed in the transformative powers of rock 'n' roll, it's Springsteen. He became famous based on his concerts, which would reach well into the night, dotted with personal stories and long, electric musical tangents. The concerts brought fans out from all over, and won Springsteen endless praise from critics. "I've saw rock and roll future and its name is Bruce Springsteen," said critic Jon Landau, who would later go on to become Springsteen's manager.

Inspired by the work of people from John Steinbeck to Woody Guthrie, Springsteen soon became the working man's musician, the hometown kid who made it big. He wrote achingly beautiful and sad songs like "Stolen Car" and "Highway Patrolman" to go along with the bigger sounds of "Born in the U.S.A." and "Thunder Road." He appealed to hips and minds.

Nothing today compares to that. Nothing carries the same gravity as Bob Dylan getting booed at the Newport Folk Festival, or being called Judas at one concert in England, or Mick Jagger refusing to change the lyrics to "Let's Spend the Night Together" for Ed Sullivan. These were important events in our cultural history. Now?

"I wanna be your Joey Ramone
Pictures of me on you bedroom door"
— Sleater-Kinney
"I Wanna Be Your Joey Ramone"

Hope springs from the small clubs and venues of major cities, and buried in record bins and independent label catalogs. Go see Rocket from the Crypt next time they hit the Middle East to see if rock 'n' roll is a transformative experience (Or don't. Unfortunately, there are rumors of a Rocket break-up). Sleater-Kinney, a three-piece, all-girl band from Olympia, Wash. curls dual vocals around tattered, winding guitar lines. Heralded only in small circles, the band possesses the passion that is lacking from so many bands on the radio. Superchunk, the Afghan Whigs, the Replacements, Jawbox, Jawbreaker, Fugazi, Wilco — all bands that have been ignored for the shinier, more artificial, music of present-day radio.

The thing that is consistent through all these bands is that they treat music as magic, just like Springsteen and the Dylan did. Listen to the widely ignored Celebrity Skin by Hole. Listen to the appreciation of pop that rests in the heart of songs like "Malibu" and "Awful." Listen to the anger in Courtney Love's voice in "Playing Your Song."

So is rock 'n' roll dead? Tough question. I prefer to think it's dormant, waiting to spring to life in anger, smiting the 311s and Matchbox 20s of the world. So what do we do in the meantime? All we can do is sit in vigil, break out the Cheap Trick, Replacements and Rocket From the Crypt albums and pray that the magic will remain.

Former Banshee's legend and ice queen Sioux tames Axis

THE CREATURES
The Axis
April 20

BOSTON — She is a legend in her own right, therefore she needs only make an appearance. The legend I speak of is Siouxsie Sioux, as The Creatures made their way into Boston Tuesday night to perform a blink-and-you-missed-it set.

Most of the performance consisted of material from their recent release, Anima Animus. The crowd was stuffed the small venue in honor of the former Banshees singer and pop goddess icon. With no opening act, Siouxsie and her drummer husband/bandmate Budgie took the stage. "Disconnected" was one of the early tunes performed that night, as well as the fairweather anthem, "Turn it On."

Siouxsie, dressed in shiny black, and a red sparkly shirt, presented herself in her famous ice-queen persona — you could actually feel the frost emanating from the stage. She was all attitude, most memorably chastising security for moving around too much in front of the stage (Security guard: "I lost something": Siouxsie: "Yeah, your job"). She showed few signs of aging, despite her over-the-top silver makeup. "Take Mine," "Pinned Down" and "Guillotine," were also some of the songs performed.

Budgie emerged from behind his drumkit to play guitar on Beastiary of Feast's "Miss the Girl," and "Say." The current single "2nd Floor" was a high-energy moment of the show, as was "I Was Me." Siouxsie contributed to the instrumentation by adding some percussion and some keyboards to the guitar bass and drums setup on stage. Siouxsie didn't really do anything tricky with her instruments, but they were invaluable to The Creatures live sound. Budgie came to the forefront of the stage for "Prettiest Thing," and "Exterminating Angel," the latter of which shares its title with a Luis Bunuel film.

The couple returned to the stage to play a two song encore. No, there were no Banshees songs performed, no cover of "Venus in Furs," no appearance of John Cale.

Although short, The Creatures managed to put on an impressive show. Despite the lack of material from what many consider to be their best album, Boomerang, Siouxsie, Budgie and company proved that they still have what it takes to be enthralling.

Arts is still alive and kicking.

Williamson is the king of teen tube

I always listen to what people tell me to do. When the Owl told me to give a hoot, I stopped polluting, and when McGruff told me to take a bite out of crime, well... we'll just say that I near lost all my teeth during that stupid ordeal. However, when it was suggested to me to write a column on the following subject by numerous people, I realized that the public was calling and I needed to answer. So for those of you who actually suggested this to me, here you go.

It's clear that teens are taking over the air waves. Whether they're meeting the world, being saved by a bell, living it up on a creek or all out kickin' ass, teens are here, there and everywhere. In the past few years, there have been quite a few shows starring teenagers and it is clear to point out why.

Besides young children's programming, shows that revolve around teenagers are the easiest for advertisers to pinpoint who will be watching. Even on extremely popular shows such as "ER" and "Friends," it can often be difficult to find out the exact audience, because there might certainly be a wide variety of people watching. The advertiser's job is much easier with shows that are geared at teenagers, because they can be pretty sure of what their audience consists of. (And while we're on the subject, if I see another tampon commercial during "Dawson's Creek," I'm gonna puke!) The bottom line is that everyone involved in teen shows benefits, and that's why there are so many of them.

The current champion of teen shows is the WB network. It seems like their entire line-up is revolving around their teenage dramas that include "Dawson's Creek," "Buffy the Vampire Slayer," "Sister Sister" and the Golden Globe Award winner for best drama series, "Felicity."

If the champion is the WB, then champion's manager is definitely Kevin Williamson. Williamson writes the hit series "Dawson's Creek" which has appealed to many people and since become the highest rated series in the networks short history. There are a lot of things that people do not know about Williamson, and do not understand about his job. One thing that is not clear on the surface is how powerful Williamson actually is in the world of show business. Williamson seems to have the world of TV, film and music wrapped around his pinkie finger, and any time an up and coming entertainer wants to hit it big, the absolute best way to do it is by going through King Williamson.

Two of the best examples of this are Jennifer Love Hewitt and Edwin McCain. Now, I know what you're saying, Hewitt and McCain are completely different people except for the small music relationship (Trust me, I don't consider Jennifer Love Hewitt's singing singing, either). The way that these two shifted from entertainers to superstars is exactly the same. Hewitt, who has a role in FOX's "Party of Five," was an rising star before Williamson cast her in his huge hit, I Know What You Did Last Summer. After her role in that film, Hewitt has become a megastar, and was even placed in Entertainment Weekly's "100 most powerful people in Hollywood" earlier this year.

Edwin McCain has a similar story to tell about how his popularity rose because of Kevin Williamson. One of the most interesting aspects of "Dawson's Creek," and some other teen shows that have followed suit, is it's ability to manipulate the music that is played in the background. "Dawson's Creek" has received much praise, because many times it takes music from struggling artists, and uses their songs in the show. At the end of each episode, Williamson takes time out to acknowledge the songs that were used, and the albums that they came from.

In last year's season finale, for instance, the shot of Katie Holmes running off of her boat, and up the stairs of the house to her fated love, Dawson, was done entirely with McCain's "I'll Be" sounding loudly. The result was that "I'll Be" became a huge summer hit, and every commercial for the "Dawson's Creek" season premiere in the fall of 1998 had "I'll Be" as its soundtrack.

Williamson's huge film success with the two Scream films paved the way for his huge success as the creator of a top notch TV show. His top notch TV show paves the way for musicians to become big. Like I said before, Williamson has the TV, film and music world wrapped around his little finger.

Besides "Dawson's Creek", there are plenty of other teenage shows that pretty much follow the same format, but not nearly as good as Williamson's gem. "Saved by the Bell," (and every other show on NBC Saturday morning for that matter, which is actually known as TNBC; you can guess what the T stands for) "Boy Meets World," and "Sister Sister" all revolve around the same basic principle and plot, that portray teenager's lives in schools, and the relationships that they encounter while getting an education. Although all three of these shows are extremely fake, they are fun to watch. The writing is usually bad, and the characters usually do not have much depth, but if you sit back and realize that the entire reason for their existence is to please advertisers selling zit cream, then you can see how enjoyable these shows can actually be.

In the past few years, we have seen two new shows that are extremely original and very successful, both on the WB. "Buffy the Vampire Slayer," which was chosen by Entertainment Weekly as the best series in 1998, and "Felicity" may have revolutionized the entire teenage show industry.

If you haven't seen "Buffy," then you're missing out. The series that stars Sarah Michelle Gellar was based on the horrendous film starring Kristy Swanson, but has become much more popular than the movie ever could. The simple idea is that Buffy, a high school student, must fight the evil creatures that lurk in her home town. The show is filled with lavish fight scenes, and dramatic tension that makes it excellent. What is so different about both "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" and "Felicity" is the very positive and strong roles of the lead female characters. These shows prove that it's not only the boys who run their schools, and ultimately take control of their own lives. Though "Buffy" will not be seeing any Emmy awards anytime soon, look for "Felicity" to possibly get a Best Drama Series nomination over the summer.

Whether you find them cheesy, annoying or light-hearted and moving, the bottom line is that teen shows are here to stay. Let's just hope that they never give Hanson their own show, because I just don't think the world is ready!

~Film Clips~

A selection of films playing in the local area:

ANALYZE THIS (dir Harold Ramis, with Robert De Niro, Billy Crystal, playing at Mountain Farms) Perhaps best described as a mixture of Donnie Brasco, Goodfellas, and Naked Gun, Analyze This looks at both the comic and dark aspects of the mob movie, instead of going for all out satire, and is almost saved by the dead-on performances of Robert De Niro and Billy Crystal. C+ (Adam Martignetti)

BLAST FROM THE PAST (dir Hugh Wilson, with Brendan Fraser, Alicia Silverstone, playing at Springfield Cinemas) A man born and raised in an isolated fallout shelter by parents stuck in the 50's ventures out into crazy, 90's California to find a wife. It's at once a ridiculous and interesting idea for a movie. But the film, despite the affecting performace of Brendan Fraser, is not brave enough to use its available strangeness to support much more than an ordinary boy-meets-girl-with-complications romantic comedy. C- (Rob Roensch)

ED TV (dir Ron Howard, with Matthew McConaughey, Jenna Elfman, playing at Mountain Farms) If you saw the commercial for Ed TV and wondered why they were making a sequel to The Truman Show, you are not alone. But Ed TV aims much lower and straight-forward than Truman, and therefore, is funnier and amusing to watch. McConaughey finally gets comfortable in the lead role and delicious cameos come from Ellen DeGeneres and Martin Landau. But ultimately, it is director Ron Howard who makes Ed TV succeed — while the former child star may not have much to say, he can certainly hold your attention saying it. B- (R.R)

GO (dir Doug Liman, with Sarah Polley, Katie Holmes, playing at Showcase Cinemas) Go begins with a bang — a loud, bright, whirling opening sequence that signals the kind of kinetic magic that director Doug Liman (Swingers) is able to bring to a movie. With a plot consisting of three interlocking stories, Liman and fresh actors like Sarah Polley, Katie Holmes, Scott Wolf and Jay Mohr make Go a new, exciting look at old movie cliches involving teen and L.A. nightlife. A- (R.R.)

LIFE IS BEAUTIFUL (dir Roberto Benigni, with Roberto Benigni, playing at Pleasant St.) There is no one happier or more energetic than Roberto Benigni, especially after winning two Oscars. Here's a chance to see the film he won for — a highly unusual, gorgeously filmed, hilarious, tragic two hours of entertainment and thought. Benigni basically plays himself, but he's much funnier when he speaks his native Italian, combining the influence of Chaplin and his own unique style, which culminates in facing the Holocaust. The concentration camp scenes are a bit amateurish, and Benigni can get on your nerves sometimes, but the overall effect is superb and devastating. A (Bryan McAllister)

THE MATRIX (dir the Wachowski brothers, with Keanu Reeves, Laurence Fishburne, playing at Mountain Farms). Keanu Reeves has an uncanny knack for starring in action films which end up dramatically affecting the genre. Such is the case with The Matrix, a sci-fi, technology age, special effects explosion that can hardly be defined. Surrounding the amazing effects is an interesting if incomprehensible story and surprisingly well rounded performances by Reeves and Fishburne. Even if The Matrix can't be fully deciphered, it's something you should see, just to blow your mind. B (A.M.)

MESSAGE IN A BOTTLE (dir Luis Mandoki, with Kevin Costner, Robin Wright Penn, playing at Springfield Cinemas) Mark Message in a Bottle "Return to sender." The Kevin Costner film has a chance to be a poetic and fair to say that the imagination and passion of the artists making the music is irrelevant. The nature of music, or any art that we take in, deeply affects the quality of thought that goes out. Which brings us to the problems of "corporate" radio rock. What's on the radio right now isn't so much unbeautiful is it is dispassionate. The fact that people listen to flat-stuff like Matchbox 20 proves the power of listeners' imaginations more than their lack of taste. Rock music is, and always has been, about image and demographics. The problems arise when the image becomes more important than the music. Third Eye Blind looks good in alternative clothes, but hit all the bland rock notes. Korn speak to angry, alienated suburban teenagers like punk did but, unlike punk, they have nothing much to say beyond blind noise. The sounds of the Lilith Fair crowd may be pretty and comforting, but also repetitive and unchallenging.

But is it impossible for music on the radio to be honest art, or must it always be cookie-cutter image bands, unfocused anger and safe, emotionally flat love songs?

Thankfully, there are many popular musicians who place personal investment in music above all else, the way touring musicians do who play rock music not for, but in spite of money. The greatest musicians are always trying to make music more beautiful than they are, not make money, which is why corporations will never fully control rock music.

More and more, the small but important group of rock artists who make money but remain artistically active are women. Women in rock don't just have money to worry about, but also the question of how to love and perform a style of music that has historically either used them as metaphorical objects of desire or confined them to the subordinate cage of the label "women's music," either angry punk or soft folk, in any case not part of the mainstream.

With forbearers as diverse as torch singers, Riot Grrrls and powerful image shifters like Madonna, artists like Liz Phair and PJ Harvey refuse to be categorized and filed away in the boxes rock makes for them. Instead, they get their revenge against rock's old boy network by tearing the conventions apart, using lyrics to tell stories that have not been told, chopping apart song structures to make them new, and by simply rocking harder than anyone else. This is not just material for another wimpy, periodic "Women in Rock" Rolling Stone cover story, this is where rock music is still alive, where bashing (or strumming) a guitar and screaming (or whispering) into a microphone still means something.

Perhaps the most popular female rock star today is Courtney Love. Her band Hole's latest release Celebrity Skin is a shining example of a contemporary rock album that is meaningful on its own merits but has been tangled up in the debate about image and music. The press chooses to dwell on Love's changing image from messy grunge heroine to fashionable Hollywood actress instead of her music, and when they do focus on her music, it is often in terms of how her fame has changed her from a raging punk goddess to a shimmery, fashionable corporate pop star. Where Hole's previous albums Pretty on the Inside and Live Through This were full of jagged edges, Celebrity Skin seems at first like a smooth pop record. Reading the new album as a sell-out is an incredibly shallow thing to do. It plays right into the cliche that she was playing "authentic" music when she sounded angry, but isn't when she sounds more gentle and relaxed (at least for part of the album). The idea that she is obsessed with fame above all else is also ridiculous, since her lyrics make only passing references to fame and glamour, and always in the context of the albums larger lyrical themes of the power of music ("Awful"), death and longing ("Malibu", "Dying", "Use Once and Destroy", "Petals") and how they are intertwined ("Boys on the Radio", "Playing Your Song"). The emphasis in the album title Celebrity Skin is not celebrity, it is skin; the plain, naked emotions of the human inside the celebrity.

The lyrics map a deeply moving landscape of loss and recovery, with obvious references to Love's lost husband and band member. You could say that the album is cheese rock carrying the emotional weight of blues. But it's also not fair to call to call the music cheese rock. It's not as simple as it first appears. To a base of jangling rock, Hole adds stuttering, rhythms on chiming guitars and the ghostly hacking vocals of Melissa Auf Der Maur cloaking Love's thick, powerful delivery in a layer of cool fog. Further, the song structures are skewed. Several songs begin with ordinary verse-chorus-verse but then bend into strange codas. "Reasons to be Beautiful," a driving rock song, peters out into a bare, desperate lullaby. "Use Once and Destroy" is an ugly rock song about emptiness that flowers at the very end into a soaring refusal to admit defeat.

Love doesn't simply wallow in sadness. The lyrics are awash in images of rebirth and resurrection and, more importantly, of rebirth and resurrection achieved through faith in music. In "Awful": "If the world is so wrong / yeah you can take it all with one song." In "Boys on the Radio" she sings about the listening to the radio: "I hear the truth / it's coming from you / oh baby come back / baby come back again." Courtney Love casts herself as the teenage rock fan in "Awful," listening to rock music, believing in it, but also seizing it, playing it herself, changing it, building a "new world." Her faith in music is overwhelming, and she pushes her faith to the limit, using it to try to raise the dead. You can feel her in the dark corners of the album whispering: Come back to me. Come shattering back into life.

She proves the act is futile by ending the album with finality of the looping, descending "Petals." It's tragic and life-affirming at once, all this beautiful music from all that confusion and pain. This is what popular rock music is capable of. We should stop expecting less.

creative romance, but instead resorts to humdrum formulas and tired melodrama. Inept acting and hopelessly slow direction mar it further. D (Adam Martignetti)

NEVER BEEN KISSED (dir Raja Gosnell, with Drew Barrymore, David Arquette, playing at Mountain Farms). Complete unoriginality fills Never Been Kissed, which shamelessly attempts to capitalize on popular genres — namely the teen movie and the romantic comedy. Drew Barrymore plays Josie Gellar, a reporter whose first assignment is an undercover expose on modern day high school students. Even Barrymore, cute as she is, can't act her way through this one. D+ (A.M.)

SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE (dir John Madden, with Joseph Fiennes, Gwyneth Paltrow, playing at Academy of Music). Art and life have had a chaotic history, alternatively frustrating and inspiring each other. In Shakespeare in Love, the Bard (Joseph Fiennes) is suffering writer's block at the dawn of the first performance of the yet-unwritten Romeo and Juliet, until he finds his muse in Paltrow. Wit, enchantment, high comedy and passion follows. A marvelous supporting cast, led by Judi Dench and Geoffrey Rush, and an impeccable script, co-written by noted playwright Tom Stoppard. A (B.M.)

pushed before. They crossed the gender barrier — and got people thinking about much more than current events. They were outcasts from the "all-inclusive" movement of the '60s, and they took control of rock music and kept the importance of rock up at the high-water mark.

Not so late afterward, punk rock was born, spawned from defiance and actually caring about something. The Sex Pistols personified the punk rock genre, stirring up anger and problems with authority all over their homeland of Great Britain. Punk rock survived well into the 1980's and ceased to exist in its original form after the demise of the Dead Kennedys. The current incarnation of punk exists in the more apathetic straight-edge hardcore clique. You can tell that punk is dead from the Van's Warped Tour — the annual festival of corporate slimness that no true, self- respecting punk band would be associated with.

The Postpunk aftermath was one of the most interesting and influential phenomena to grace rock and roll. It was here (somewhere around 1979 lasting on into the mid-late '80s) that the rock genres which actually have a pulse today originated from. Goth/techno/industrial/Brit-pop all have their roots here. The range of bands associated with this era are as exciting as they are eclectic: The Smiths, Bauhaus, New Order, Pet Shop Boys, Blondie, Siouxsie and the Banshees, The Cure, Sonic Youth, etc. 80's synth-pop was also associated with the postpunk era. This was the time of Devo, The Buggles, A Flock of Seagulls and the birth of MTV.

In the mid to late eighties, when hair metal was overshadowing the postpunks, rock was suffering its first drought in two decades of creativity (Disco may have been a time when rock was hurting as well, but there were plenty of alternatives). When truly excellent bands like the Pixies were overshadowed by bands like Motley Crue, Skid Row and Poision, rock music was actually choking on its own marketing rules. What rock needed was a savior at this point. And that savior was one of the people you'd be least likely to suspect.

When Nirvana exploded onto the mainstream in 1991, it was just what rock and roll needed. Frontman Kurt Cobain, with his authentic punk sensibilities, sparked a genre of music the likes of which had never been seen or heard before. The next thing you knew, every garage band in Seattle was coming out of the woodwork, and grunge was born. Despite its overwhelming popularity, grunge died a quick and painless death in 1995.

Now there's not much redeeming stuff left. The few artists in the mainstream that are interesting enough to make rock last (The Smashing Pumpkins, Liz Phair, etc.) are trying their hardest, but that may not be good enough. Other bands putting out pure and fun rock and roll (Gigolo Aunts, Letters to Cleo) aren't getting the recognition they deserve and music on the fringes just keeps improving, while mainstream rock just keeps deteriorating. On a side note, in last month's Alternative Press, Marilyn Manson was quoted as saying that we must be wary of bands that have a number in their name: Manchbox 20, Third Eye Blind, 311, Seven Mary Three... they will be the death of music as we know it. As much as I hate to agree with anything Marilyn Manson says (it's not like he hasn't driven a few nails into rock's coffin), this is all too true (U2 being the one exception).

Let's face it, rock is going down smoking. It is not even possible to define what is rock and what isn't anymore. But through this sea of towering lameness that we hear on "99.9 Rocks" there might be hope, and a feeling that we shouldn't put rock and roll out of its misery just yet.

EUNICE R. KONIECZNY STUDENT LEADERSHIP AWARD
This monetary award was established in 1985 to recognize students who exemplify the highest leadership and public service ideals to the entire university community and who demonstrate a commitment to the vitality of the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF). Student participation in out-of-class activities as a complement to academics involves personal development, leadership and team building, sensitivity to diversity, and advocacy for student needs and concerns. Candidates must show how their participation enriches both their organization and by extension, the larger campus community. This award honors Eunice R. Konieczny who provided over twenty years of dedicated service to the Student Government Association.
QUALIFICATIONS
1. A senior who is a current RSO or SGA officer with one academic year of experience as an office holder prior to this time and
2. Cumulative G.P.A. of 3.0 or above.

Wings are even better than last season and are on the verge of becoming the league's next dynasty. The Ducks do have Teemu Selanne, the first Maurice "Rocket" Richard Award winner, given to the league's top goal scorer. They also have Paul Kariya. They're Ducks though and they don't have Red Wings. Sorry, had to do it. Pick: Detroit in five.

In the second round, Dallas will beat Phoenix in seven and Detroit will beat Colorado in six.

In the Western Conference Finals, Detroit will beat Colorado in six.

In the Stanley Cup Finals, Detroit will three-peat in seven.

• Don't think I forgot No. 99! There is so much to say about the Great One that I'm sure you have heard all week, so instead of boring you with his stats and accolades I simply want to say thanks to Wayne Gretzky for all he did for the game and for the way he did it — with class!

UMass women's tennis beats WC; preps for A-10's

By Matt O'Neill
Collegian Staff

Amid scattered showers Tuesday afternoon, the Massachusetts women's tennis team shut out Williams College by a score of 7-0.

The win improved the spring record for the Minutewomen to 6-5, and ended the home career of seniors Gillian Kane and Jackie Braunstein with a victory.

"It was great to send our seniors off with a win," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "Gillian's dad came all the way up from New York to see her play, so that was nice."

Dixon was afraid that the team would come out flat from the many distractions of the weather and the Senior Day activities.

"I was worried about the team's mentality because of the weather," Dixon said. "But they came really focused. We put everything together and played an excellent match."

Dixon was impressed with the convincing play of the Minutewomen.

"Sometimes a coach can just sit back and enjoy the match," Dixon said. "This match was one of those times when I didn't have to do much coaching at all."

The play of Robyn Lebovitz, a 6-2, 6-0 winner, and Helena Horak, a 6-0, 6-4 winner, was also a something that pleased Dixon.

"Robyn played well at the number four spot, she cut down on her unforced errors," Dixon said. "Helena also played well. She is really starting to play the short balls better."

Helena Horak and Ola Gerasimova won the only doubles match of the day without surrendering a point to the Williams duo. The number two and three doubles were unable to finish due to rain.

Additionally, Annie Hamilton and Ali Tross were honored for their play against Seton Hall last week. Tross was named Atlantic 10 Freshman of the Week, while Hamilton was Atlantic 10 Player of the Week.

"Ali and Annie winning freshman and player of the week was phenomenal," Dixon said. "That is the first time a UMass team has ever had both a freshman and player of the week at the same time."

The win for the Minutewomen was the last tune-up before the team heads to Blackburg, Va for the Atlantic 10 tournament.

"It was great to have such a convincing win before the A- 10s," Dixon said, "It gives us the confidence we need going down Virginia."

Hasek leads Buffalo past Ottawa, 2–1

KANATA, Ontario (AP) — Dominik Hasek's 40 saves lifted the Buffalo Sabres to a series-opening 2-1 playoff victory over the Ottawa Senators last night.

Michael Peca scored in the first period and Curtis Brown in the second for the Sabres, who were outshot 41-15 but leaned on Hasek's acrobatics and made the most of their rare chances on shaky Ottawa starter Ron Tugnutt.

Wade Redden scored for the Senators, the series favorites who are looking to avenge a first-round loss in seven games to Buffalo in 1997.

The Sabres lead the best-of-7 Eastern Conference quarter-final 1-0 with Game 2 set for tomorrow night in Ottawa.

A chanting, sellout crowd of 18,500 waving white towels handed out at the door greeted the Senators, but from the outset it appeared that Ottawa's worst nightmare — being shut down by two-time league most valuable player Hasek — might be realized. Hasek made some big saves early while the Sabres scored on their second shot on goal.

Peca partially fanned on the backhand on Vaclav Varada's pass in the slot and the puck rolled past a startled Tugnutt for a 1-0 Buffalo lead at 4:32.

Ottawa outshot the Sabres 16-4 in the period and tied it on a power play at 14:46 when Nelson Emerson slipped the puck along the blue line to Redden, who stepped into the high slot and drilled it inside the right post.

In the second period, Bruce Gardiner was off for slashing when, after a point shot by Alexei Zhitnik went wide, Peca slipped the puck to Brown all alone in front of Tugnutt. Brown's high shot from in close gave Buffalo the winner 11:24 into the second.

The Senators lost a good chance to tie it in the opening minute of the third when Bonk batted a rebound toward an open net, only to see the puck hit Peca's skates.

Harvard's final goal.

But UMass was not finished. A goal from Keith Gabrielli, a sophomore midfielder, 40 seconds after the final Crimson score swung momentum back to the Minuteman side.

Janowicz, a junior attackman who started the season quietly, closed out the UMass offensive campaign with two goals late in the game. The first came with 6:03 remaining in the game, the second three minutes later.

Campoletano stopped nine shots in the Minuteman cage, while Cynar made 12 saves. Earlier in the season, Cynar's younger brother, Justin, came out on the winning end in contests against both Campoletano and the Minutemen and the older Cynar and the Crimson.

The Minutemen will now look to string together a two- game win streak. The task will not be an easy one, however. Notre Dame, a team UMass defeated 8-7 last season in Indiana, will visit Richard F. Garber Field on Saturday, a game that appears on the schedule as a Sunday contest. Game time is still 2 p.m.

Jeremy Guski scored the only goal of the second quarter in UMass' win over Harvard yesterday afternoon.

However, a recent bright spot for UMass can be the significantly louder pop in the bats.

Senior Aaron Braunstein is shouldering the brunt of the power with eight home runs, including one today, and 37 RBI. Brian Samela has three dingers and leads the team with 12 doubles and 21 RBI. Leadoff batter Shaun Skeffington consistently sets the tables quite nicely, batting .313 with five triples and two homers. The senior second baseman also leads the team with 24 stolen bases, a feat that holds enough water for ninth in the country.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Shaun Skeffington

Freshman Mike Kulak, who produced the game-winning double on Sunday against Xavier, has become a consistent starter in centerfield. Bryan Mazzaferro is third on the team with 33 hits including four doubles while batting .311.

Another recent improvement in the past four games has been resurgence of the bench.

Freshman Chris Morgan has tallied two round-trippers with three doubles as the catcher frequents the plate more and more often. On Sunday, sophomore Nick Gorneault drove in the tying run against the Temple Owls on a streaking single.

First baseman Gavin Clark has also made the most of his chances, earning the start yesterday while crushing his first ever homer. Clark has contributed via clutch hits in pinch hitting situations to earn more time.

Last Thursday, the Minutemen fell hard to Northeastern, 17-8. Even after a solid three-game sweep over A-10 rival Xavier, UMass couldn't maintain the momentum. It was another weekday loss. The Minutemen hope that it will be the last ugly lost.

"We've won four games in a row and the team seems to be coming together," Clark said. "Everything is working out."

Maybe yesterday's win will mark the start of a new beginning for those pesty five days of the week.

After the shaky opening frame, Henderson battled back to retire 21 of the next 22 batters she faced.

With the victory, Henderson improved her stellar record to 20-2, and set the stage for more Minutewomen mound magic in game two.

With one win already in the books for UMass, sophomore hurler Carrie Jeffries followed Henderson with a shutout gem of her own. Scattering four hits through seven innings, Jeffries blanketed the UConn offense, and ensured another 3-0 UMass (32-8) victory. The win improved Jeffries season mark to 11-3.

Once again, UMass freshman Cherra Wheeler battered the opposition at the plate. The 5-foot-10, power-hitting first baseman blasted two home runs between both contests. Batting in the No. 3 spot in the order, Wheeler finished the afternoon accountable for half of the six RBI for the Minutewomen. The first long ball came in the fifth inning of the opening game, giving Henderson two insurance runs and opening the lead to 3-0. Wheeler belted her second home run in the first inning of game two.

Leadoff hitter Mandy Galas led UMass with three hits between both contests. The senior second baseman opened game one by tripling in her first at-bat, and scored the eventual game-winning run on a UConn (18-16) error moments later. Galas followed in the fifth inning with a single, and connected for her final hit during the seventh inning of game two.

Left fielder Becky George added to the 1-0 Minutewoman lead in the fifth inning of game two with an RBI single off Huskie pitcher Jill Cameron, who fell to 7-7 with the defeat. George also singled in the fourth inning. Designated hitter Octavia Brown also added a pair of hits for UMass.

In addition to Wheeler, the Minutewomen have been aided by another freshman phenom, Ashley Bakken. Before breaking her left hand in three places earlier in the month, Bakken had the second highest batting average on the team behind Galas. Although she has not been able to hit since the injury, Bakken, known for her speed, has been used as a pinch runner by coach Elaine Sortino, and appeared in the fourth inning of game one.

Currently riding a 12-game winning streak, UMass prepares for a doubleheader battle with Atlantic 10 rival, Rhode Island. The Rams will host the Minutewomen at noon on Saturday. Danielle Henderson is slated to start game one, and Jeffries, game two.

notching 24 goals and 37 steals during a stellar freshman campaign. She avoided a sophomore jinx by kicking her game up a notch in '98, netting 35 goals while setting the UMass single-season record for quarters played. She also tied the UMass single-game assist record with five against Brown on March 7.

Claudia Clement

By the onset of her junior year, Clement had mastered both the field and 2-meter positions, and her enthusiasm and versatility made her an ideal candidate for captaincy.

"What makes Claudia a good leader is that she really knows people," Hupp said. "She communicates just as well outside the pool as inside, and makes a great mediator between the players and coach."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Laurie Edwards

Ohio native Hupp is another UMass star who's mastery of the sport sprang from the men's version. After traveling and tracking statistics for the men's team during her freshman year at Upper Arlington High School, Hupp and seven other women formed the school's first women's water polo program in 1994.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Katie Grogan

Despite the lack of a coach or any real playing experience, the Hupp-led Golden Bears placed second in the state during their inaugural season. The next year, the addition of a coach and a dozen more players spelled the first of back-to-back state championships for U.A.H.S. By the time Hupp graduated, the roster had swelled to more than 30 players.

"It was amazing how quickly the team grew," Hupp said. "To go from eight players my first year to more than 30, it feels good to know I was a part of that [growth]."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Marci Hupp

The water polo prowess gained by Hupp in high school translated into a monster rookie season at UMass. Her 29 goals placed her fourth on the squad in scoring, while her 14 years of swimming experience made her a tenacious presence on defense. Hupp came back with a vengeance in '98, finishing third on the team in points and goals, while tallying two game-winning overtime goals in the playoffs.

Hupp's talents aren't confined strictly to water polo, though. As the sprint freestyle leader for the UMass swim team. Hupp must balance her academic and social priorities with two varsity sports that often conflict.

Rounding out UMass' four aces is Laurie Edwards, a field player known for stifling defense and a Howitzer of a left-handed shot. The native of Lansing, Mich., has made a career of overcoming adversity, bouncing back from major surgery and a bout with mononucleosis to capture team MVP honors during her senior year at East Lansing High.

"I wouldn't be here if not for the adversity I faced during high school," Edwards said. "Having the strength and courage to get through that has made me a much stronger player."

Like her UMass counterparts, Edwards made waves immediately after arriving on the collegiate water polo scene. She played practically flawless perimeter defense from the get-go, and her offensive output (nine goals and 10 assists in 32 quarters of play) gave her teammates good indication as to the dominant scorer she was to become.

"Laurie has steadily become more assertive and aggressive," Hupp said. "Her stepping up as a leader has really made us a better team."

So, as the Minutewomen prepare for this weekend's Eastern Championships, they know that all the pieces of the winning formula are in place. It's now just a matter of playing their cards right.

Abdullah has a solid day at karate tourney

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts sports program has little knowledge of her, and UMass fans probably have a very limited recollection of her. However, in her world and in karate arenas around the nation, freshman Janeelia Abdullah has touched all those who have watched her grow and compete.

To start it off, her success in martial arts reign is simply amazing. In the field where the competition is intense, it's hard enough to be able to just stay with it. Yet, with Abdullah, nothing seems impossible. With just one year of experience, she has competed in numerous fights, and she has lots of fun while doing it.

Last weekend, Abdullah competed in the Hainzy Karate Tournament, where she took third in form and fourth in combat.

"I was the only one representing the school," Abdullah said. "I felt I was cheated of, but I had a lot of fun and I was able to compete with the women in the more advanced field."

In another recent event, the Vermont Tae Kwon Do National Karate Tournament, Abdullah had beaten six older and more karate experienced women to take the crown with her powerful Kajukenbo combat technique.

In the women's form division, Abdullah had also come through, as she dominated the competition and took the first place award with her newly developed and breathtaking kata, called the snake form.

"It was a great experience," Abdullah said. "I get to go out and show people what I have learned."

Indeed, she has established herself and has been representing UMass with a great pride. Her competitive fire and progress have earned praise from all around.

"She is a special person," said her instructor from Griffin's Judo and Karate Studio, Johnathan Williams. "A lot of young people today don't have her discipline and dedication. Master Griffin and I are very proud of her [to say the least]."

In a sports program where karate is merely a club event, Abdullah has never stopped preparing herself. Practicing constantly under the wings of sensei Williams and Master Griffin, a nine degree Kajukenbo East Coast Representative, Abdullah has learned Karate under proper guidance.

"Sensei William's and Master Griffin's teaching styles are very strict, but it has been fun," Abdullah said. "They have never let me down and they have been fair."

Perhaps her achievements is due largely to her passion for the sports.

"I love karate. I gained confidence and discipline," Abdullah said. "When I compete, it is just me and the other person. I just try to relieve all my anger on that person; it's great. [Now] I am able to go out and defend myself."

So this is what -Janeelia Abdullah does, and as long as she continues to improve and compete with the pace she is in right now, the UMass student body may hear more and more of what she has to offer.

COURTESY JANEELIA ABDULLAH

UMass student Janeelia Abdullah is actively involved with the sport of karate and has been successful in many tournaments in the region.

Taylor gets through day; Inks contract with Lions

Editor's Note: This is the second of a two-part series regarding All-American tight end Kerry Taylor.

"This is stressful. There is no other way to put it," said Kerry's mother Donna.

That summed up the way the whole household felt on Saturday. It is now Sunday the final day of the draft.

Lawrence Redford

11 a.m. — The second day of the draft is set to begin. Kerry takes his ceremonial place on the couch and gets ready for another long day. While only a few tight ends were taken the first day of the draft, it seems every other pick is a TE on the second day. In all, 12 tight ends were taken in the draft.

Taylor has scouted most his competition and knows a lot about the other tight ends in the draft. Without missing a beat he would comment on the other tight ends picked ahead of him.

At one point Taylor says, "There is no way he is better than me! He only caught 29 damn passes. Oh, this is bullshit!"

At this point, close friends and teammates Andy Maclay and Lance Overby arrive to offer support. They attempt to comfort him.

Kerry and his agent, Steve Calandrino, have discussed his options and came to the conclusion he will be playing for either the Ravens, Patriots or Lions. When any of these teams have a draft pick, the room silences awaiting the pick — and time after time it leads to disappointment.

"I can't handle this, I don't know how you guys watch this," says Donna as she rises from the couch and disappears up the stairs.

3 p.m. — Many names go by of people Kerry has played against or worked with. This leads to mixed emotions. At times Kerry seems happy, and other times he slams his fist on the table with the drop of a hat.

"This has got to be one of the worse things I ever went through in my life," he said. "I see all these people I know get drafted but I'm still sittin' here. It's just frustrating."

3:17 p.m. — Calandrino calls saying "Calm down and don't worry." He informs Taylor that Detroit has one more pick in the next round (the seventh and final round). Calandrino adds, "They will use it on you, a linebacker or an O- lineman."

The phone rings about six or seven more times over the course of five minutes. Family and friends are asking for the latest update on his status.

Kerry is trying to keep the phone line free so he can receive calls from teams. Unfortunately, all attempts are in vain. His voice mail has one new message. The San Diego Chargers called and said they would like him to come in as a free agent. Kerry calls his agent to let him know.

After getting off the phone with Calandrino, Taylor tells the bunch, "He said wait till it [the draft] is over and we'll see then."

4 p.m. — It's seventh and final round of the draft and stress and exhaustion are setting in. The Patriots call to inform Kerry that New England has the 227th pick overall and they want to use it on him. This would be ideal for Taylor, as Foxboro Stadium is a short drive from his house. He could play for an NFL team and still be with his family.

4:06 p.m. — Detroit's last pick comes up. Donna sits on the couch while Kerry's stepfather Walter looks in from the dining room. Kerry reaches down, picks up his kid brother Blayne, and rests him on his lap.

The last pick for Detroit is defensive end Mike Pingley. The room is silent, and soon Donna goes into the kitchen with Walter. Moments later a representative from Detroit calls to say he will call back after the Patriots use their last pick.

5:06 p.m. — The draft is at pick number 241 (the Patriots had passed Kerry by with pick 227), which is the Patriots last pick. They take Sean Morey, a wide receiver from Brown. No one speaks. Kerry glares at the television in disbelief. The silence is broken by the ring of the phone. It's the Lions and they want to do a deal.

"I guess the chief scout (for Detroit) is a former NFL tight end and he thinks the world of me," Kerry says as he hangs up the phone. His agent calls and says he is talking to both the Chargers and the Lions.

5:30 p.m. — Kerry takes a phone call from Calandrino and reveals he is the newest member of the Detroit Lions. He leaves this Thursday for mini camp.

Kerry's family converges in the kitchen in a giant hug. Walter breaks down and begins to cry. "I'm proud of you," he says.

Kerry calls his father and tells him the news. "Yeah dad, I'm a Detroit Lion."

Yes he is, a lifetime of hard work comes to fruition over the course of 48 hours. Tomorrow Kerry will be in Detroit beginning his new life in the NFL. Congratulations Kerry.

LaVallee off to the NCAA finals

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

After a seventh place finish in its first ever appearance at the NCAA East Regional, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team sent one stellar athlete to Nebraska yesterday, for the NCAA National Championships.

Junior Jeff LaVallee, who placed third in the East Regional all-around competition, will go head-to-head with some of the top gymnasts in the nation.

LaVallee placed 14th out of 68 competitors in the 1999 Winter Cup Challenge in February and was a member of the U.S. National Team from 1994-1996. He took two years off in between high school and college in order to prepare for the 1996 Olympics, but he was just short of the trials that year.

The Connecticut native has been the lead man for UMass the entire season, breaking all-time highs and setting new personal bests. Even with some trouble on high bar, he set the school all-around record with a 58.275. He set the all- time highs on vault (9.80), parallel bars (9.90), and high bar (9.90), and holds the fifth spot on pommel horse (9.775), fourth on floor (9.750), and third on the still rings (9.925).

The year 2000 Olympic hopeful has earned Academic All- American Honors. ECAC Honors, has been named Athlete of the Week on numerous occasions, and just recently earned a spot on the GTE/CoSida Academic All-District I team, with an outstanding performance at ECAC's and a GPA above a 3.80.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may feel as though others are crowding you at this time, and indeed there is little room for you to maneuver as you would like today.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You'll feel confident today that you've "paid your dues," but in fact, there are one or two more duties you must tend to before nightfall.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Your organizational skills may not hold up on their own against a challenge currently facing you today. With a little help, all can be different.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Career issues are highlighted today, even though you are concentrating on more personal matters that are usually favored on the weekend.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Internal rhythms must not be underestimated today. Get in touch with those things that really make you "tick."

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Place yourself in best light today, for a golden opportunity is just around the corner. You mustn't sell yourself short at this time.

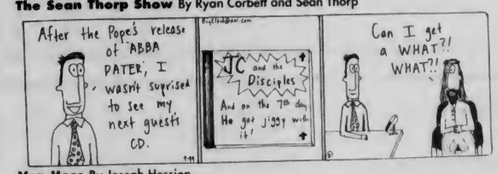
SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — What you stumble upon today may prove to be more important than anything you may have planned on, and you'll want to take action at once.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may be nervous about a promotion or another development at the workplace. Others have more faith in you than you may realize.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may be trying to pull the wool over the eyes of someone who knows you better than you think. When in doubt, revert immediately to the truth.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may have to negotiate carefully in order to get the best possible deal today. Someone may be trying to "test" you in some way and you'll know it.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Be ready for some creative problem solving today. With a little innovative thinking, you can shine among your peers when it comes to simplifying.



ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Domestic harmony can be achieved and maintained today, provided you do not attempt to prove your point in a manner that is inappropriate.

NHL playoffs are set to start; The Great One retires

Well, it's my favorite time of year again. The Stanley Cup Playoffs are among us and it's time to get "Cup Crazy."

I've warned my girlfriend that all plans for the next two months are to be scheduled around the Bruins' and Red Wings' playoff games. Unfortunately for her, they play on separate days. One day the Wings will be playing, the next day the Bruins play, so she better be prepared for two months of intense hockey and plenty of beer.

Hey, if either the Red Wings or the Bruins win it all, she will at least have some champagne to drink and recover from the lunacy I possess during the playoffs. Something tells me that if she still loves me two months from now, I've probably found the right one!

Murph's Playoff Predictions:

Eastern Conference

•New Jersey vs. Pittsburgh — The Devils are the best road team in hockey and Martin Brodeur is still a wall in front of the net. They also have a spread-out scoring attack with four players having 20 goals or more. As for the Penguins, they have the best scorer in hockey, Jaromir Jagr, but he won't win the series single-handedly. Pick: Devils sweep.

•Ottawa vs. Buffalo — In the regular season, these two teams tied four times with Ottawa winning one. Ottawa has been one of the most pleasant surprises this season, as Alexi Yashin finally became the scorer Ottawa management saw in him when they drafted him eight years ago. The Sabres, of course, have the Dominator, Dominik Hasek in net, and as we have seen before, a hot goalie can take his team all the way. However, they have absolutely no offense and no matter how good Hasek plays, goals still tend to be a key to success. Pick: Senators in six.

•Toronto vs. Philadelphia — This series will be a beauty! The Flyers will not have the services of Eric Lindros, but that doesn't mean they will go down easy. As a result of late season deals, the Flyers have some depth. Depth or no depth, the Flyers will still have to get the puck by Curtis Joseph, who many believe was signed by the Leafs specifically for a playoff run. Cujo has been the anchor of two playoff upsets in the last two seasons, knocking off the Avalanche last season and the Stars the season before. Both came while he was playing with the Oilers. The Leafs were also the highest scoring team in the league this season and are healthy as can be heading into the postseason. Pick: Leafs in six.

•Boston vs. Carolina — Byron Dafoe is the league MVP. Joe Thornton is most improved player and Anson Carter just gets better and better. As for the Whalers, I mean the Canes — call them what you want — they still can't beat the B's! Prediction: Bruins in five.

The second round will see the Bruins beat the Devils in six and the Leafs beat Ottawa in six.

In the Eastern Conference Finals, Toronto will beat the Bruins in five.

Western Conference

•Dallas vs. Edmonton — A rematch of the seven game classic in '97, which Edmonton won. Edmonton doesn't have Joseph anymore, they have Tommy Salo. Salo is unproven in the playoffs and has been unable to prove himself in the regular season as well. Dallas is solid all around and poised to win the real cup, not just the Presidents Cup for the best regular season record. Pick: Dallas sweeps.

•Phoenix vs. St. Louis — Well, thanks to the Stars' Derian Hatcher and his vicious elbow on the Coyotes' Jeremy Roenick a week ago which broke Roenick's jaw and knocked him out indefinitely, the Coyotes' chances of going far are slim to none. However, the Blues' chances are not much better. Phoenix still has the services of captain Keith Tkachuk and newcomer Robert Reichel, and if Nikolai Khabibulin gets hot, they could make some noise.

St. Louis has depended on the scoring of forward Pavel Demitra, who finished with 82 points. After Demitra, though, the Blues are a young team and just don't have enough depth to make it past the first round. Pick: Phoenix in seven.

•Colorado vs. San Jose — San Jose reminds me of the '94 Rangers squad. They are full of journeymen like Mike Vernon, Joe Murphy, Vincent Damphousse and Dave Lowry. These veterans have created a perfect chemistry with the younger players such as Patrick Marleau and Owen Nolan. As we saw with the '94 Rangers team, chemistry is a key ingredient to success in the playoffs. Unfortunately for the Sharks though, Mark Messier was the most important ingredient for the Rangers, and considering he is probably on some exotic golf course with Wayne Gretzky, they might be in some trouble. The Av's have just too many weapons. Pick: Avs in six.

UM baseball rallies to beat Vermont, 11–8

Clark breaks through with game–winning two–run longball

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The expectations were high for Gavin Clark coming into the 1999 season, but unfortunately for the Massachusetts first baseman/outfielder, he had been mired in a hitting slump for practically the entire year.

However, all of that changed quickly yesterday afternoon at Earl Lorden Field with one swing of the bat.

The Minutemen (18–12, 7–2 in the Atlantic 10) were tied at 8–8 with the University of Vermont heading into the bottom of the seventh inning. With two outs senior co- captain Seth Kaplan singled, and Clark followed that up with his first home run of the season. The two-run bomb to right center field came on a 1–1 fastball that the Springfield native belted out of the yard.

"It felt good [to hit the home run]. I've been waiting a long time to get a good piece of the ball," said Clark, who finished 2–for–4 on the afternoon. "I glad our team was able to get the win today."

Junior second baseman Shaun Skeffington then made it back-to-back longballs after he took a Jason Spaulding offering over the left field fence.

UMass rallied from a 7–2 third inning deficit to come back and record the win. After losing badly in their last two weekday home games, the Minutemen rallied in the middle innings to pick up the victory.

Also a big factor in the victory was the performance of junior reliever Todd Samolewicz, who tossed four and one–third scoreless innings to earn his fourth win of the year. The southpaw also had seven strikeouts.

"We hadn't been playing well during the week, so it was nice to keep the momentum going today [that started with a sweep against Temple over the weekend]," Samolewicz said. "We got some clutch hitting today, first with Gavin, and then Skelly followed that up with another big hit."

Vermont (15–13) got to UMass starter Nick Skirkanich early and often yesterday. By the time the third inning rolled around, Skirkanich was done for the day and freshman Brian Hourigan was also having his problems on the mound.

Staked to a 7–2 lead, Catamounts starter Trevor Marcotte began to lose his touch. UMass got two runs in the bottom of the third inning, highlighted by an RBI–single by Brian Samela.

The Minutemen then went on to put up four runs in the fourth inning to take an 8–7 lead. Clark and Skeffington both singled to start the threat, and Bryan Mazzaferro was hit by a pitch to load the bases. Freshman Mike Kulak then came through with an RBI single to trim the Vermont lead to 7–5 before Aaron Braunstein, who also belted a two–run home run in the first inning, slapped a two–run single to right field that tied the game at 7–7. Junior outfielder Steve Asadoorian closed out the rally with an RBI single that brought home Braunstein.

"We just kept getting runs and kept going. It's a long game, a nine inning game, and you've got to keep playing," Clark said.

Vermont evened the game in the fifth inning against Hourigan. Doubles by Todd Gryzwacz and Mike Cole knotted the game at 8–8.

The game then stayed that way until the seventh, when Clark and Skeffington connected for a pair of homers that put the game away for UMass.

"This was winning ugly. Aside from Todd Samolewicz and a couple of big home runs, we were ugly today," UMass baseball coach Mike Stone said.

Ugly or not, it will still go in the books as a win, something which the Minutemen will look to use to their favor this weekend when they face Fordham University in a key Atlantic 10 Eastern Division series.

"Things have been going good. We've won four in a row and the team seems to be coming together now," Clark said. "Everything seems to be working out."

Skeffington led the UMass offensive attack with three hits, while Braunstein, Kaplan and Clark all added two each for the Minutemen.

Baseball getting it done on the weekends

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Another mid–week hurdle was crossed by the Massachusetts baseball team (18–12, 7–2 Atlantic 10), as they narrowly beat Vermont 11–8 at Earl Lorden Field yesterday. This win is a bit of a novelty for the Minutemen, though they are currently riding a four–game winning streak.

Though experiencing a rocky 0–6 start to open the season, the Minutemen have also enjoyed a five–game winning streak during the 1999 season. In short, UMass has struggled to maintain consistency.

Take, for instance, Central Connecticut. Over Spring Break the Minutemen shushed CCSU with a 17–0 trouncing. However, two weeks ago, UMass eeked by 8–6. Scoring as many as 18 runs (Lafayette), UMass has also been held scoreless against a dominant opponent (North Carolina St.). Booted ground balls and an inability to take advantage of runners in scoring position has hurt UMass, no doubt.

It is important to point out, nonetheless, how the days of the week seem to affect UMass, sometimes more than the opponent. On the weekdays, the Minutemen are just 4–6. However, they are perfect on the weekends, going 9–0 since their return from Spring Break. The Minutemen average 7.3 runs during the week, but drop to 6.1 runs per game on the weekend.

"We hadn't been playing well during the week, so it was nice to keep the momentum (from the weekend's sweep over Temple) going into today," winning pitcher Todd Samolewicz said.

Truth be told, the weekend tandem of Travis Veracka and Bill Cooke, who is closing in on the school record for most wins, have tossed back–to–back complete games on the weekends. David Loonie has been contributing some solid efforts as the third link. Craig Szado is creating a niche for himself as the weekend closer. The sophomore has logged 36.1 innings of work and leads the team with 37 Ks in seven appearances.

The weekday starters of Nick Skirkanich, who is tied for the team–lead with nine appearances, along with Brian Hourigan, Samolewicz and Jesse Santos have struggled at times, but are making definite improvement in holding up their end of the bar-

UM men's lacrosse is an 8–4 winner over Harvard

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Both the Massachusetts and Harvard men's lacrosse teams went into yesterday's contest in Cambridge looking to end three–game losing streaks.

Behind a pair of goals from Jay Negus and two more from Mike Janowicz, the Minutemen put an end to their skid and kept their record against New England opponents perfect for the season with an 8–4 win.

Jay Negus

Negus, a senior midfielder, got the ball rolling for UMass (4–6) with a score off a feed from freshman Don Little just under four minutes into the first quarter.

Sophomore Rich Kunkel, who was shut out of the points column for only the second time this season against Loyola last Saturday, upped the Minuteman advantage to 2–0 on a goal with 6:19 remaining in the first.

Kunkel entered the game tied for the team lead in points with classmate John Madigan with 23 points. But an assist to complement his goal gave Kunkel a one–point advantage over Madigan, who helped on a goal yesterday.

Feeling some pressure, Harvard halved the UMass lead with 1:05 left in the opening frame when Roger Buttles fired a shot past Minuteman goalie Chris Campolettano.

Jeremy Guskt tallied the only score of the second quarter to lift UMass to a 3–1 edge at halftime. Early in the third quarter Negus and Little each connected on shots that beat Crimson goaltender Keith Cynar to give the Minutemen a 5– 1 advantage.

But Harvard mounted a comeback bid. Michael Bailey jump–started the 3–0 run with 6:49 left in the third quarter. Within the first 3:11 of the fourth quarter, Buttles notched his second of the game to pull the Crimson within two at 5– 3. A short time later, Dana Sprong added

UMass softball takes 2 from UC; Henderson, Jefferies lead the way

By Aaron Saykin

The ball was invisible — or it at least seemed that way to UConn batters yesterday.

Riding the laurels of its dominating pitching, the Massachusetts softball team swept both games of a double-header against the host Huskies.

Senior ace Danielle Henderson, fresh off a perfect game at St. Bonaventure on Sunday, plowed through the Connecticut batting order and helped UMass cruise to a 3–0 win in game one. The NCAA strikeout leader fanned 12 Huskies and limited them to only two hits, both of which came in the bottom of the first inning.

UM water polo on top thanks to its four aces

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Winning on the road is never easy. The miles of travel, unfamiliar settings, and hostile crowds faced during away contests all conspire to spell doom for a visiting team. So how has the Massachusetts women's water polo team managed to play the winning hand in 19 of 25 grueling road games this season?

Quite simply, four–of–a–kind always beats a full house.

The four aces of coach Dan McOsker's No. 9 ranked Minutewomen are juniors Katie Grogan, Claudia Clement, Marci Hupp and Laurie Edwards. Despite coming from four distinctly different water polo backgrounds, these elder leaders of the Maroon and White form a rock–solid nucleus on a team that has won a staggering 54 games over the last two seasons.

"The fact that we all live together definitely hasn't hurt," Edwards said. "We know each other so well, we can really play off of each other's emotions in practice."

Co–captain Grogan has been the sparkplug of the UMass offense all season, an offense that has netted a whopping 277 goals thus far in '99. The California native broke her own single–season scoring record last year, tallying 174 points and 97 goals en route to her second consecutive All– American team selection.

A former member of the U.S. National Team, Grogan was also named Collegiate Water Polo Association MVP and earned spots on the All–Championship teams at both the Eastern and National Championships. In only two years at UMass, she already holds career records for goals (188), assists (159), and points (347).

"Katie is the mother hen of the team, the glue that holds us together," Hupp said. "She's a constant, reassuring presence that makes us all a lot more comfortable."

As one of five Californians on the UMass roster, Grogan represents a key link to the west coast style of water polo. Not only did the sport originate in the Golden State; the Nation's top eight programs all call the West Coast home.

"Typically, West Coast polo is more focused on swimming and finesse, while East Coast style depends more on muscle," Grogan said. "UMass has gotten a lot more balanced... than in years past."

The other half of the UMass captaincy is shouldered by Claudia Clement, a prolific scorer with a markedly different background. Born in Venezuela, Clement learned the ins– and–outs of the sport in Guam, playing pick–up games against primarily male opposition.

Despite bringing limited women's team experience to UMass, Clement adapted to the UMass style at a staggering rate,

Rosenberg talks on citizen duty

ROBERTO DELGADO / COLLEGIAN

Senator Stan Rosenberg speaks to 13 student Citizen Scholars recently accepted into the 1999 Commonwealth College Scholar's Program.

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

When Senator Stan Rosenberg came to the University of Massachusetts campus last night to talk about public policy and citizen action, he left the audience with some simple words of advice — "don't go bowling alone."

When he gave that advice, he was referring to a decrease in community involvement and what he sees as a recent "society disengagement."

The senator's visit was part of the Commonwealth College's inaugural Service Learning 1999 Scholar's Program. As a UMass alum, Democrat Sen. Rosenberg was invited to speak on his views of community service to the 13 citizen scholar students recently accepted into the program.

The 13 scholars accepted into the 1999 Scholar's Program are: Anna Cohen–Cole, Brandy Curtis, Michael Gove, Helena Horak, Jamie D. Ice, Aimee Julien, Jennifer Kuhr, Lymaire Lhovet, Lauren McDonough, Tara Misra, Katie Murphy, Jennifer Powers and Genevieve Rose.

The philosophy of the Scholar's Program is that a combination of academics and community service can help students become more engaged in society and the changes they make on it. Sen. Rosenberg reiterated this belief by speaking about the importance of building community and the unique status of Massachusetts citizens in this respect.

Using research done by Harvard professor Robert Putnam, Rosenberg spoke about Putnam's theory that "the vigor of civilian life is an indicator of legislature." In his research, Putnam found a decrease in voting and community involvement over the last 20 years, while the amount of people bowling alone has increased.

"If you fail to do what you can do... you've missed your opportunity to solve problems. All of these add up to make a web... and stronger community," said Rosenberg.

Propane bomb discovered; police say Colorado killers planned to blow up school

By Steven K. Paulson
Associated Press

LITTLETON, Colo. — The two gunmen in the Columbine High massacre were planning to blow up their school and probably had help from others, investigators said yesterday after discovering a powerful bomb in the kitchen that had been built from a propane tank.

"These subjects were not only on a killing rampage, but they were going to destroy the school," Sheriff John Stone said. "They were going to burn the school up."

The discovery of the 20-pound propane tank heightened suspicions that the two killers had help from other people, either with building the 32 bombs discovered so far in the school, its environs and the killers' homes, or getting them into the high school. An earlier report said there were two bombs in the kitchen, but investigators may have been misled because there was a gasoline can next to the one bomb, a sheriff's official said. Investigators still believed the gunmen may have had help.

"It's a feeling from our investigators that the chances are very, very good that we have more than two people involved," sheriff's spokesman Steve Davis said.

CNN reported that a note left by one of the gunmen was a suicide note that indicated the two teen-agers acted alone. "This is the way we want to go out," the note said, according to CNN, which cited unidentified sources.

Davis said he had no details on a note that was found at one of the gunmen's homes.

Eric Harris, 18, and Dylan Klebold, 17, armed with sawed-off shotguns, a semiautomatic rifle, a pistol and homemade bombs stuffed with nails and shotgun shells, killed 12 students and one teacher Tuesday before taking their own lives.

The bombs found yesterday used a propane tank similar to those on backyard barbecue grills. Nails and BBs had been taped to the tank to create shrapnel.

"Twenty pounds of propane can create quite an extensive amount of damage," Davis said.

District Attorney Dave Thomas said: "No one saw them carry it into the school and people did see them enter. So we have to explore how that device got into the school."

Authorities had already been looking into the possibility of additional suspects because of the amount of ammunition and explosives left behind.

"It's drawing suspicion out here that they would have time to put as much ordnance in that school as they did without some help," the sheriff said.

Fourteen people remained hospitalized, eight in critical or serious condition.

Meanwhile, crews used bomb-sniffing dogs as they carefully picked through thousands of backpacks, briefcases and boxes strewn across the carpets, classrooms and hallways. Investigators are also working to trace the weapons to determine how the teen-agers got them.

The attack inspired an apparent copycat act by teen-agers on Wednesday, although there were no weapons involved. Four teens were charged with trespassing in Colorado Springs after arriving at school in trench coats and masks.

Trench coats like the ones worn by the two gunmen have been banned in Denver and two other Colorado districts since the attack for fear they could be used to hide weapons.

Classmates said that Harris and Klebold were part of an outcast group called the Trenchcoat Mafia and that they wore black and spoke German to each other. They believe the gunmen timed the attack for Adolf Hitler's birthday.

Haigis Hoopla arrives tomorrow

Sports management students organize annual event

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The 1999 New Balance Haigis Hoopla Tournament will take place this Saturday and Sunday at the University of Massachusetts Haigis Mall.

A total of 36 basketball hoops will be set up for the more than 450 teams participating in the event. Each team is designated a division based on different age and skill levels.

The highest skill division is the Top Gun Division, which includes players with four years of high school basketball experience. That ranking is followed by Hot Shots, Weekend Warriors and Couch Potatoes. Age level divisions include the Wee-Wonders (ages 10 and under) followed by Playground Kings (ages 11–12), Running Guns (ages 13–14) and Bomb Squad (ages 15–18). A special division called "Endorsed by No One" is for ages 35 and up.

Other events include a whiffleball contest, a three–point shoot–out, a slam dunk contest, an interactive area and a "Bounce For Beats" fundraiser sponsored by Sigma Alpha Mu.

"The event is hosted by a sports management class and staffed by student volunteers. The 18 undergraduates and 13 graduate students in the department are receiving credit for organizing the event.

Sponsors for the event include New Balance, WHMP 99.5 FM, Daily Hampshire Gazette, Valley Advocate, Spalding, Kaplan, Coca–Cola, Powerade, Dominos Pizza, Dana Automotive, Kids Sports, Bueno Y Sano and other local businesses.

Media relations coordinator Mike Sarro, a sports management graduate student, says the event is expected to attract more than 15,000 people nationwide over the two days.

"When we can put on a show for about 15,000 people, that is successful and enjoyable," Sarro said. "It's the culmination of a year's worth of work for everybody."

Sarro says the best feeling is seeing the hundreds of smiles on children's faces. He also feels the experience is beneficial for students interested in sports management–related professions.

"It certainly helps [to participate in Haigis] for those people who are looking to become sports management majors as well as getting into the class," Sarro said.

Junior sports management major Sabrina Sherman has helped recruit over 400 volunteers to run the event. She says the basketball tournament is the best hands–on experience.

"The skills you learn are transferrable to any field and you learn more than you could ever imagine," Sherman said.

Stolen cars recovered by local police

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Two cars were stolen from the University of Massachusetts campus last week, on the same evening that two downtown Amherst businesses were broken into.

One stolen vehicle was discovered by Amherst Police with a broken steering column. Police contacted the owner of the vehicle, who said the car had been parked in Lot 11, near Alumni Stadium.

The second vehicle was also parked in Lot 11, and was last used on the afternoon of April 15. UMass police came across the vehicle near Massachusetts Avenue and Stadium Drive. Similar to the first vehicle, the steering column was broken. The gear shift was also popped.

The car was impounded and held for fingerprinting at the request of the Amherst Police.

According to UMass Deputy Police Chief Barbara O'Conner, the first vehicle was recovered last Wednesday morning, April 14, near the location of a robbery that had occurred the night before in downtown Amherst.

Two businesses were broken into late Tuesday evening, April 13, or early Wednesday morning, April 14. Bart's Homemade on North Pleasant Street and Chicago Pizza on Sunset Avenue, near Southwest Residential Area, according to Amherst Police reports.

It was the second break–in at Bart's this month. Two large safes and four cash drawers were discovered missing on the morning of April 6, an Amherst Bulletin April 16 article stated. The same article reported a similar break–in on April 12 at Pasta e Basta on Main Street.

UMass Chief of Police John Lulipold could neither confirm or deny the possibility of a connection between the car thefts and the restaurant break–ins.

Amherst Police Detective David Knightly, chief investigator of the Amherst break–ins, said he could not comment because of the ongoing nature of the investigation.

Milosevic's home destroyed

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — President Slobodan Milosevic has accepted the idea of a U.N.–controlled "international presence" in Kosovo, a Russian envoy said yesterday. Hours earlier, NATO struck directly against the Yugoslav leader for the first time, destroying his luxurious mansion.

In a diplomatic bid to end the conflict, former Russian Premier Viktor Chernomyrdin held daylong talks with Milosevic. It was unclear whether the international force discussed would be armed, under what guidelines it would operate or whether the offer represented a real peace gesture. NATO has insisted it must lead any armed presence in Kosovo to enforce a peace agreement. Milosevic has so far rejected NATO demands to withdraw his troops from the embattled province and grant autonomy to the ethnic Albanian majority there.

Chernomyrdin said after the talks that he and Milosevic had "considered the possibility of an international presence led by the U.N. in which Russia would take part."

"Those are the basic principles we agreed upon," Chernomyrdin said.

President Clinton said in Washington that he did not have details of what was discussed.

"If there is an offer for a genuine security force, that's the first time that Mr. Milosevic has done that," Clinton said.

As allied leaders gathered in Washington for a 50-year alliance anniversary summit, NATO's missile strike on Milosevic's mansion delivered a graphic message to Belgrade that it remains resolved to crush his forces if doesn't pull them out of Kosovo and commit to peace.

Milosevic and his family were not home during the attack on the residence, according to state officials; he has at least one other home in the capital. NATO says that since the bombing campaign began March 24, Milosevic has spent each night in a different bunker.

As refugees continued to stream out of Kosovo, where hundreds of thousands of ethnic Albanians remained displaced, NATO jets rained dozens of missiles on the Pristina area, the provincial capital. The Yugoslav state news agency Tanjug called it the fiercest daytime attack yet.

"NATO cannot permit a rebirth of fascism in Europe" a half-century after the Holocaust, British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said in Washington. "Our military campaign is proving effective."

Missiles also targeted Yugoslavia's second-largest city, Novi Sad, in a rare daytime attack.

But the most startling strike was the one before 4 a.m. that ripped into the white two-story mansion in Belgrade's Dedinje district where Milosevic sometimes lives.

Tree limbs, pieces of concrete, shards of glass and other debris carpeted the columned mansion's grounds. Streaks of black soot dirtied arches where elegant windows once stood, and one side had a gaping hole.

Yugoslav officials expressed outrage over what they said was an attempt to kill their leader, saying three laser-guided bombs blasted Milosevic's bedroom, living room and dining room.

"NATO committed a criminal act without precedence — an assassination attempt against the president of a sovereign state," said Goran Matic, a government minister.

WMUA celebrates 50th

By Matthew Call
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend one of the oldest Registered Student Organizations, University of Massachusetts radio station WMUA 91.1 FM will celebrate its 50th anniversary by handing over airtime to former students.

Starting today and running through Sunday, UMass alumni will have the chance to re-create their radio shows and air them to a whole new audience. Former disc jockeys returning to campus for the anniversary will be behind the microphone for a three-day radio reunion.

The music, sports, talk, public affairs and news programming of WMUA first started on November 21, 1948, broadcasting 15 hours from South College. After changing to FM in 1952, it became one of the first non- commercial, college-run FM stations in New England.

In the 50 years since, the station has moved to Marston Hall and ultimately to the Campus Center basement in 1983. WMUA now broadcasts 24 hours a day, year-round.

Glenn Siegel, the station's advisor for 12 years, is looking forward to hearing the eclectic weekend of programming. "It runs the gamut," he said. "It will sound like a crazy quilt of oldies and rap.

"Some of the people coming back are still in the field and doing things in radio, but some are completely out of it," Siegel added. "Many people have spent a lot of hours here when they were students, so it's something that they're interested in doing again."

The anniversary, which has been planned for over a year, also includes a dinner Saturday night that will allow alumni to reunite with each other and exchange stories of their time at WMUA, as well as provide a chance to meet the current staff.

"It's a great way for current students to meet people in the field who started with WMUA," Siegel said.

Among the alumni returning to do their old shows is Kevin Mitchell, whose label Codeine Records released the platinum album "Make It Reign" from rappers Lord Tariq and Peter Gunz last year. Mitchell's set is scheduled for 11 p.m. Saturday night. Frank Donovan, one of the original members of WMUA, will do a show from 3:30 – 5 p.m. on Friday.

The station has won a number of awards over its history. Most recently, it won its second consecutive sports play-by- play award from the Associated Press. This year's award is for the station's coverage of UMass football. The Valley Advocate has also designated WMUA as "Best College Radio" as part of their Best of the Valley awards.

Man accused of DC murders judged incompetent for trial

By Nancy Zuckerbrod
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The man accused of killing two police officers in the Capitol last summer is incompetent to stand trial, a federal judge ruled yesterday.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan ordered the Federal Bureau of Prisons to place Russell Eugene Weston Jr., 42, in a facility that offers mental health services for a "reasonable period of time, not to exceed four months."

Sullivan set a conference for Sept. 9 to evaluate Weston's treatment and its effect on his competency.

"Russell Eugene Weston Jr. presently suffers from a mental disease or defect that renders him incapable of understanding the nature and consequences of the proceedings against him," Sullivan said. The judge also said Weston is unable to aid in his own defense.

"That's absolutely correct," said Weston's attorney, A.J. Kramer. "You can't have a rational conversation with him about the case. He's totally delusional."

Weston is charged with murdering Capitol Police officers John M. Gibson and Jacob J. Chestnut in the Capitol on July 24, 1998. He has not entered a plea.

Prison officials did not say where Weston would be placed. "It's not public information where someone is going until they arrive there," bureau spokesman Dattiel Dunne said, citing security concerns.

The bureau operates five prisons with psychiatric facilities for men. Weston probably will end up at the prison in Butner, N.C., because that's where the psychiatrist he spoke with in October works, law enforcement sources said. Court documents unsealed by the judge yesterday showed that psychiatrist Sally C. Johnson, believed Weston was a paranoid schizophrenic and not competent to stand trial.

"He believes that he is the commander in chief of the Armed Forces... in control of time and time reversal, a brilliant scientist, and that he had a special relationship with President Kennedy," Johnson wrote in her evaluation. But she did not rule out the possibility that Weston could stand trial after he receives treatment.

Ousted Haitian lawmakers flee

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) — Three ousted lawmakers took refuge with the Chilean ambassador yesterday, fearing militants who rioted for a third day to protest the killing of a political activist.

Former Rep. Wilner Raphael fled to the Chilean ambassador's residence after his house was riddled with bullets and his car was burned Wednesday.

A wave of crime and allegations of police brutality have swept over Haiti as politicians struggle to restore the government after a 22-month political impasse. President Rene Preval has tried to resolve the deadlock this year by dissolving Parliament on Jan. 11 and appointing a new premier by decree.

The protesters, who belong to grassroots groups allied with Preval, built new barricades of debris in a Port-au-Prince slum yesterday and set them on fire. Schools and businesses remained closed in the city center.

The latest protests were sparked by the death Tuesday of Michelange Philistin, 25, who the protesters claim was shot by police after he got into a street fight. Philistin was a member of a group allied with Preval.

Chancellor to fund 12 diversity proposals

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Thanks to recent grants distributed by the University of Massachusetts, students will be able to access library information in their native languages, receive personal attention when their computers crash and live in a residence hall based on international conflict management.

The Chancellor's Counsel on Community, Diversity and Social Justice has agreed to fund 12 proposals by students, faculty and administration to promote cultural understanding on campus.

The proposals were approved by the Counsel's Requests for Funding, Awards and Recognition Committee, and given grants ranging from $250 to $1500. A total of $15,000 in funding was granted.

In order to be approved, programs had to fit three requirements — they had to promote mutual respect; enhance understanding of community; diversity and/or social justice issues; and encourage collaboration between different campus communities and constituencies.

One of the approved proposals was the Information Technology Assistants (ITA) Pilot Program, which will hire students in Coolidge and Patterson Residence Halls to personally assist students with computer-related problems next year.

"The hope is that instead of students carrying their computers to Lederle, or calling an anonymous person at the help line, students can call someone they know in their own building," said Academic Program Coordinator Vivian Ostrowski, who helped develop the ITA program.

"It's a great idea," she added. "Students will love it."

Another approved program is designed to provide support to staff members and employee supervisors with learning disabilities, as well as to promote inclusion and increase public awareness of these disabilities.

"We hope to go, on invitation, to any office on campus and basically conduct a mini-informational session on learning disabilities within the campus community," said program organizer Cheryl Howland, a library assistant.

Other proposals approved by the Committee include:

• the development of a web site for Religious Holidays and Religious Affairs, and Learning Communities and Networks;

• working with Arise for Social Justice on community empowerment projects, to "work with the city of Springfield towards becoming more responsive to the needs of minority and low-income residents;"

• a funding project to host a visit by Sufi leader Pir Vilayat Inayat Khan;

• "Domestic Violence, Workplace Violence, Sexual Assault and Gay Bashing: The Experience Rendered in Words and Art," a forum for victims of violence;

• Program for Intercultural Conflict Management Training, a multicultural living experience for any interested students, including international students;

• Wellness Center for Diversity and Development (WCDD)/Seminar Pilot Program, which "creates a resource and gathering room for WCDD and a pilot seminar with strong community service and social justice components;"

• a computing workshop for teachers of the Holyoke Public Schools and bordering school districts;

• a program to translate informational library brochures and web pages into Spanish and Chinese; and,

• SEARCH (Southeast Asian Refugee Coalition to Help), a project to link local Southeast Asian girls with Asian- American Five-College women.

Sen. Rosenberg, who was raised in foster care and benefited from a state education, feels that, "those who benefit from a public education owe back."

Rosenberg added that "somewhere between one-half and two-thirds of education is paid by taxes... therefore it seems to be you have an obligation, you owe some of it back to the community."

In recognizing the role of Massachusetts residents, Sen. Rosenberg explained that Massachusetts is one of few states that grants citizens the right to free petition — allowing them to appeal directly to the legislature to have a petition filed — ultimately giving them a greater power to make or break a law.

Introduced as a "citizen scholar of the first rank," among other things, by Chancellor David K. Scott, Rosenberg feels that one step in increasing community involvement is to recognize students for their role in community service, and to help them gain advantages in graduate schools and employment.

Howe to speak at CRC Extravaganja

A crowd of more than 1,000 people is expected on the Town Common this weekend for the annual Extravaganja.

The "anti-Prohibition political rally" will be held tomorrow from noon to dusk with attendance, according to a press release, peaking "around 4:20 p.m."

Speakers scheduled to appear include University of Massachusetts Student Government Association President Jeff Howe, UMass comparative literature professor David Lenson and former gubernatorial candidate Dean Cook.

Howe said he would be speaking about rights of students in regards to privacy and the Fourth Amendment, because he and Student Trustee-elect Seth Avakian have been working on SGA motions about those issues.

"As far as my involvement with it, I hope students learn what rights they have in their rooms," Howe said.

Several bands are also scheduled play throughout the event, including Kay Jah Funk, Electric Blue and the Kosmic Truth, Jaya the Cat, Soulworks, Hip Blaster Monkey, Loose Caboose and Joint Custody.

UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) Vice-President Liz Rising said that although many students usually come to the event, they are not the sole attendees — individuals from Amherst and others from out of town also attend.

Rising also said while there will be police at the event as in past years, she doesn't expect there will be any problems.

The rain date for the event is Sunday.

Extravaganja is sponsored by the UMass-Amherst CRC, a student organization at Hampshire College and the Amherst College CRC.

Varsity Blues

The starting quarterback for the University of Massachusetts Minutemen nervously crouches behind his grotesquely obese 400-pound center. The center, whose rippling biceps are paralleled only by his equally gelatinous mid-section, whispers the count in a shrill voice filled with anxiety. A defensive linesman for the University of Connecticut Huskies, fraught with seething anticipation, digs his two-inch metallic cleats into the softened earth with ferocious rage.

Bill Larkin

The quarterback calls for the ball, hoping the sibilance of his voice will excite the rest of the team. He falls back into the pocket with the graceful ease of a jungle cat and prepares to throw. He checks his first receiver, a tall drink of water with hands of gold. Unfortunately, his gilded reputation proceeds him, and two gregarious defensive backs drape him in a shroud of shoulder and sinew. Just as the venerable quarterback attempts to find the secondary and tertiary receivers, he is blindsided by that very defensive linesman who not 30 seconds earlier had been growling in the dirt, obscured by the relative safety of the offensive line.

The quarterback falls to the ground with a chilling thud. His helmet, strewn by the impact of the defensive linesman, lay cracked on the grass. Teeth infiltrate the sidelines and blood finds sanctuary on uniforms. Stunned by the vicious hit, the quarterback calls for his girlfriend, but no sylph appears to satiate his misery. He is left staring at the sky, his azure eyes so very indicative of that mindless lapse of consciousness into which he is about to fall. The last light that flows into his eyes bears the image of a stocky balding man with sweat dripping from his forehead, screaming, "Get up, get up! We've got a game to win!"

Now, while I would not wish the preceding autopsy on any man, as fiendish as he may be, I do not feel that the stresses of athleticism warrant academic credit, particularly at our fine institution. Wednesday night, the Student Government Association attempted to pass a motion that would provide physical education credits for students athletes who participate in a varsity-level sport.

This unfounded rubbish is a complete bullock. The University of Massachusetts at Amherst is and always will be an academic institution. We as students pay tuition in the vain hope of acquiring both worldly knowledge and a degree that lends credence to our upcoming professions. We are not here to play sports; we are here to incense the kiln of our futures.

Aside from expatriating the very nature of this our academic homeland, offering academic credit to varsity athletes is an unfair atrocity. Where is the line drawn? How many sports apply to this lottery? Why should I be punished because I am a pasty and emaciated Irishman with absolutely no basketball potential? There are far too many questions and scenarios that demean the significance of this measure.

I write for the Collegian. Do I receive credit for outpouring my soul onto these hallowed pages on a biweekly basis? Of course not — I often have to pay my editors to print this rancid sewage. Imagine that! Then again, I do use this column as a platform for the good of the Communist Party, so I guess a few rubles is a worthy price for the brainwashing of tens of thousands. Yvet?

To be quite honest with you, I don't think physical education classes should yield academic credit either. To do so would create a disturbing trend, the reality of which is a horrid and cantankerous nightmare.

It is a rather simple ideal, really. We attend an academic university. We learn by putting brain cells to their originally designated functions as sieves of knowledge and not as victims of marijuana.

If you want to play sports, fine. If you want credits for playing what is essentially a game, please step into my office because you're fired. Clean out your office and go see human resources. I want you off of the University by 4 p.m. today. Go back to the playground. Tell your mom I said "hi" and "thanks for the kielbasa." But for the rest of you, please keep Amherst as the hub of academia.

You know, maybe I'm wrong. Perhaps this academic credit idea is not so bad after all. Maybe I should try out for the campus drinking team. I am an excellent "bullshit" player, and my "flip-top" skills are beyond compare. My "asshole" skills are renowned throughout the land: I earn my keep at feudal castles across the countryside by entertaining parlor guests with my mastery of "circle-of-death." I know I could make the varsity squad, even as a sophomore.

I don't think I'm going to any more of my classes. I have much to practice, and I simply can't devote any more of my precious time to these meddlesome academics. Alcoholism is a major unto itself. I deserve credit for drinking myself into a hazy stupor. So, until next semester, I will be perfecting my "hi-low" style. After all, tryouts are only four months away.

Conflict of interest

I guess this is just one of those cliched moments in any adolescent's life. It's approximately 2 a.m., and I am thinking those overly-analytical thoughts again.

This time period in history seems pretty surreal to me: there is a war going on; the government is just starting to dust itself off after a string of embarrassments; and there is massive genocide in the Balkans. The United States is currently dropping bombs all over Kosovo in an attempt to beat Slobodan Milosevic into submission. The new twist to this is the growing congressional support for sending in ground troops and getting involved more heavily than we already are.

This proposition seems eerily similar to a small conflict we went to "fix" in Vietnam about three decades back. The strange part is, many times these days when our military gets involved in something; people often make the remark that this has the makings of the "next Vietnam." I would tell all those people that they were wrong every time except now.

I believe that implementation of ground troops in Kosovo is a very, very grave mistake. We can draw comparisons throughout history with the American Revolution and Vietnam, we can see some glaring similarities among all of these conflicts. These wars were all fought in nearly the same situation — one huge foreign power with seemingly unlimited resources fights a smaller, poorer army of the native nation. The smaller army always wins because it is familiar with the terrain, and it uses tactics that the larger arms has no way to expect or defend against.

An election is coming, and we can draw more comparisons to Vietnam. Clinton doesn't have to worry about re-election anymore, so his decision on the deployment of troops will be a genuine decision, not motivated by an election. His position is fairly strong thus far; he doesn't want ground troops yet, yet.

Brian Lohnes

I also believe that if we do send ground troops and this does escalate into a full-blown war, protests the likes of which we haven't seen in 30 years will erupt. The days of building-takeovers and teach-ins will be back and they may be more volatile than the first time around. I can only see that this country will be headed into another period of drastic change and social division.

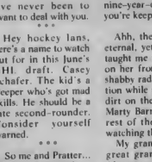
In another sense this war scares the hell out of me, and it should scare the hell out of every late-teen and twenty- something guy. The Army is currently on a huge recruiting campaign because its enlistment is down 20 percent from what it once was. On the surface this doesn't seem all that important, but it should. Every 18-year-old male in this country signed up for selective service on his 18th birthday; it's the law — do it or go to jail. A draft is not totally out of the question here. If this does escalate, a draft is a very real possibility.

I fear this scenario because I would go fight for my country. Both of my grandfathers served time in the military when the country needed them and to run away would be a slap to them. I don't know how most people feel about this but that is my opinion. I know it seems far-fetched, but the thought of our country sending 500,000 troops to a place called Vietnam probably seemed far-fetched decades ago. I hope for my sake and yours that this war doesn't happen. Unfortunately, it looks like it's going to.

Would you go to war if your country called you? This has been a question that has haunted me for a long time and I would have to say for myself that I would go. I know that this war doesn't have any direct effect on the security of the U.S. and some would argue that we should pull out totally, but innocent people are being slaughtered. Can you imagine for a second what it would be like if all of a sudden Catholics and Jews became bitter enemies and dragged the country into a bloody civil war? Can you imagine your parents' house being stormed by armed men and everyone inside was killed simply because they were at variance religiously? This is the nightmare in Kosovo, and it's not going to go away until somebody does something drastic. Unfortunately, we always seem to be that "somebody."

Bill Clinton has been quoted as saying the prospect of American casualties is "very real and high." He has also said that the war will last through the summer at least. Also, an unnamed high-ranking U.S. general has said that NATO has had a contingency plan for ground war since 1998. Has anyone else heard anything about this contingency plan? Troop escalation seems to be more of a "when" question than an "if" question. So far the air strikes have not done much to deter the Serbs, and I really don't think they will. The whole concept of using air-strikes to drive someone to the negotiator's table has worked once in recorded history. That one time, 100,000 people were killed with one bomb, in one day in Japan. So why do we do it?

We do it because at least then it looks like we are doing something, and it gives military leaders the leverage to bring troops. It's a fairly simple process: when the bombs don't work we send troops, and it seems like a natural progression because we have become so enraged at the country we were bombing we want it destroyed. This was the situation in Desert Storm. We started bombing Iraq when they wouldn't leave Kuwait. Then there are the attempts at diplomatic solutions but they, like clockwork, fail every time. It's tough to negotiate with someone who wants to wipe out an entire group of people. Milosevic is hell-bent on killing as many people as possible. I don't think he will ever surrender, and he will probably die before he is captured.



I will do my duty as a citizen if I am called. It may not be a popular decision I know, but it's one that I hope I never have to truly make. The war is going to be long and bloody and I hope for all of us that it doesn't become "Clinton's Vietnam."

My own private bubble

I've never considered myself claustrophobic. But I'm one of those people who will sit on the edge of an unfilled row in the lecture hall. (You know — I'm one of those annoying people you always have to step over to get a seat.) When I ride in airplanes, and I'm forced to sit very near people, I will turn the mini-fan on full-blast if I can't weasel my way into getting the window seat. Some might call me obsessive, but we all have our hidden little foibles. Here are a few of mine: I involuntarily hold my breath after someone sneezes. I flush the toilet with my foot. And I also (in case you hadn't figured it out) just like having my own personal space.

It's not that I have any particular aversion to people. I love people — I really do. I just like having that extra two to three feet of air around myself. I remember standing at the bus stop one day (having already spaced myself at an adequate distance from the nearest person) when this odd- looking lady wearing a bright (we're talking highlighter bright) red and purple shawl and oversized sunglasses started inching towards me. Not too unusual, I thought, but still she was a little closer than I liked. Casually I side-stepped to my right, discretely trying to keep my precious bubble of space. When I glanced over, the lady had inched towards me again, and this time she was closer than before. I pretended to wander up to the curb to see if the bus was coming (come on bus — hurry up!). I glanced over my shoulder only to find myself face to face with that odd little lady — close enough to see the hairs on her upper lip. Just then the bus arrived. Heaving a sigh of relief, I clambered on.

Carolyn Dong

Personal space is probably a cultural thing. In some countries where the population density is higher maybe it's okay to stand two inches from the next person. Maybe that odd looking lady was from a different country — or from a different planet for that matter. So it's okay lady. I forgive you.

At any rate, if I'm outdoors there's always somewhere else to go. Elevators on the other hand, are another story. I'll be waiting on the ground floor of the library for the usual 10 or 15 minutes for an elevator to stop. When it finally arrives, by the time I reach the doors at least 10 people have already gotten in before me. I consider waiting for the next car, but then I might be here all afternoon and "General Hospital" is on soon — can't miss that. So I get in and try to find the least awkward place to stand (all of the much-coveted back wall spaces are occupied). The doors close and we begin the ride up. Here's where I have to remind myself to breathe slowly. I think to myself, "Okay now, just breathe... in and out... oh God! What's that funky smell? Maybe I shouldn't be inhaling too deeply... it's not much longer — I can hold my breath." The elevator proceeds to stop at each floor. As more and more people get on I wonder what the carrying capacity of this old junk box really is. I crane my neck to try and read the maximum weight label above the buttons, but I'm closed in on all sides by backpacks and sweaty arms. Still trying not to hyperventilate I try to figure out where to focus my eyes. I have to find something soon or I'm going to hurl all over my favorite Reeboks. When the car is almost empty, I can generally just stare at the lit numbers above the door and the dizziness goes away.

When the car is as packed as it is today, I can barely see over the guy's shoulder in front of me. In my mind I start picturing horrifying events like the cord snapping and all of us plunging down the elevator shaft to an untimely death. Maybe we'd make the front page of the Collegian. Finally the elevator stops, the doors open and I push my way into the open.

Why this bizarre fear of elevators, you might wonder? The truth is: I don't know. Perhaps it all stems from some repressed childhood memory that I will eventually recall (I think it has something to do with a tennis ball and a piercingly loud alarm). On the other hand, I may just have an overly-active imagination. We all have our hidden little foibles. Maybe that's just the way I am.

Truth is, we make up the crossword and the horoscopes (and sometimes, we like to make yesterday's Aquarius today's Capricorn). So sit on it, Pottsie.

A month from now I'll be leaving this lovely campus (at least until summer session starts) and before I go I just want to share with the general public a few gems I've discovered in my time here.

If you get the chance, check out: The grad student lounge (and yes, undergrads can go in there!); the Academy of Music in Northampton; the porn shack on Route 9; Castaway's Lounge (Jimmy the Greek knows what's going on); the Whitmore Snack Bar (it's the only place where you can a.) get Coke in a can on campus and b.) see the Chancellor getting a Greek salad with feta cheese); and the Collegian (God knows we don't get out of the basement enough, the least you can do is come down and show yourself).

And If you've never been to Rafters, I don't want to dwell on you.

Casey Kane

Hey hockey fans, here's a name to watch out for in this June's NHL draft: Casey Schafer. The kid's a sleeper who's got mad skills. He should be a late second-rounder. Consider yourself warned.

So me and Pratter... Wait... Nevermind...

You know what's not cool? Liking nine-year-old girls. Not cool, indeed. Even if you think nine-year-old girls are hot. Even if you're keeping it raw. Man, come on.

Ahh, the Red Sox. Hope springs eternal, yet again. My grandmother taught me to love the Sox. We'd sit on her front porch listening to the shabby radio with the crackly reception while my brothers played in the dirt on the front lawn. I rooted on Marty Barrett (my favorite) and the rest of the team. I stayed up late watching them in the '86 Series.

My grammie, who is now in the great grandstand in the sky, was 11-years-old the last time the Red Sox won the World Series. I hope I get to see one before I go. Who knows, this could be the year.

Messy Mess can get a what-what! Poindexter can too!

* * *I wanna give another shout-out. There's a kid on this campus who understands when I say I've had a class in 180 PI.C. eaten at Hammy's, seen a game at Autzen, and hung out at the EMU. What's up, Mr. Oregon?

Joel gives classy farewell

By Sanford Appell

BILLY JOEL
Continental Airlines Arena
April 20

East Rutherford, NJ — In what may have been his last live performance, Billy Joel added yet another highlight to his illustrious career Tuesday night at the Continental Airlines Arena.

The concert was rescheduled from February as a result of Joel succumbing to a vicious snow storm that prevented him from making the trip to the Garden State.

Thus this became the final date on what Joel announced to be his farewell tour, at least for the foreseeable future.

The song-writing extraordinaire took right to the Ivories upon entering the stage, pounding out the maniacal piano- based introduction to "Angry Young Man."

Following "Anthony's Song," clad in a black sport coat and matching slacks, Joel assured the capacity crowd that he would concentrate on his older classics since he was not promoting a current album.

After a stellar rendition of "Allentown," an ode to unemployment in the steel industry, the Long Island native assembled what he labeled the "geographical portion of the program."

This influx included "New York State of Mind" which had local implications for even the most diehard Jersey spirits on hand.

The tremendously melodic "Summer Highland Falls" was chosen over "Vienna" by the crowd's response as the next title to complete the regional selections.

Joel really hit his stride on "Pressure," an edgy cut off 1982's Nylon Curtain. He mesmerized his faithfuls, reaching an intensity level that would have been hard for the 49-year old to have matched decades ago.

A come-down became almost a necessity as he crooned "Innocent Man," one of his old standbys, and one of the clearest displays of the vast ranges in his voice.

While audience participation was evident often, it became most apparent during a passionate sing-along during "My Life" midway through his two and a half hour set.

"Big Man on Mulberry Street" was one of the few random picks of the evening, and proved to be the only noteworthy flaw in the lineup.

Perhaps the most pleasant surprise was a medley of cover songs, including "Surfin' USA" by the Beach Boys, and "Dazed and Confused" from Led Zeppelin.

Joel's rendition of Elvis Presley's "Don't Be Cruel," complete with hip shimmying and swaying, proved the old- timer can still get down, which may have shocked Joel himself as much as anyone else.

The biggest breakthrough of the night came in the form of a roadie simply referred to as "Chainsaw," who memorably concluded the medley with AC/DC's "Highway to Hell," with Joel partaking on lead guitar.

The gargantuan, long-maned rocker electrified the arena as its professional sport tenants rarely seem to do, proving there is life on the other side of the Hudson.

After a severely toned-down version of "It's Still Rock and Roll To Me," Joel exited the stage for the first time, before a thunderous ovation brought him out for an encore.

He went for broke on "You May Be Right," stretching it for a solid six minutes before concluding with "Piano Man," the 1973 classic that he would not dare omit from any of his performances.

After one last swig off of a champagne bottle presented to him on stage, Joel and company bowed and disappeared into the night, leaving only the glimmer of hope that he will someday return to the stage.

"Melissa Anderson does a great job defending one-on-one. She is one of our tougher midfielder defenders. She usually marks the other teams best midfield player. I think she did a really good job on Nicole Ross from Temple," McClellan said. " She plays an important role and she is a real workhorse who loves to play and it shows in game."

Another key for the Minutewomen this weekend will be the continued strong play of sophomore netminder Jen Nardi. Nardi has continued to improve her stats throughout the course of the season, as she has played seven games, going 4-3 and has a GAA of 6.56, and a save percentage of .722.

"She [Nardi] done a nice... consistent job, which is something we have been after for a while. She has given us stability in our defense game," McClellan said.

Nardi was also the player mentioned in Kortutz's reflection on her teammates. When asked which part of one player's game Korutz would most like to add to her repertoire, Korutz spoke of the sophomore cage-minder.

"Jen Nardi — when she gets in the cage, she is so mentally tough. She doesn't let anything affect her. If a goal goes in she decides that the next one isn't, and before every game she fires me up like no one else can," Korutz said.

But one of the major focuses of the weekend has to be on the two Minutewomen who will be playing in their last game at Totman field. While both players are trying to down-play their last game, the emotion is seeping through.

"I just can't believe it's already been four years. I know that a big part of me will be taken away once lacrosse is finished. I just don't think it's really hit me yet that this is the last weekend," Korutz said.

"I feel like a part of me has been removed. I'm already thinking about it. I don't know what it's going to be like when I graduate and I don't have to run a mile anymore or pool running.," Anderson said. "I'm going to miss playing with everybody, I love everybody on this team."

Korutz and Anderson, who have been a big part of the resurgence of the UMass lacrosse program, reflect on their career here at UMass. In 1982 the UMass lacrosse team won the National Championship and held the University's only title until the football team won this year. Korutz and Anderson have been a big part of bringing back lacrosse.

"We definitely improved over the four years. It was nice coming to a building program, and as freshman we had a lot of fun because we got to play right away. It gave us some good experience," Anderson said. "When we first got here we were 4-10 and we have just continued to get better and better. Sophomore year we got a chance to get to 500 and after that we've been over 500 and last year we got to go to ECAC's which was cool. It's fun being with a building program and being a part of it."

Korutz reflects on one of her fonder moments at UMass for both her and the UMass team as a hole when they received a bid to play in the ECAC's last year and took No. 1 seed Penn State to overtime.

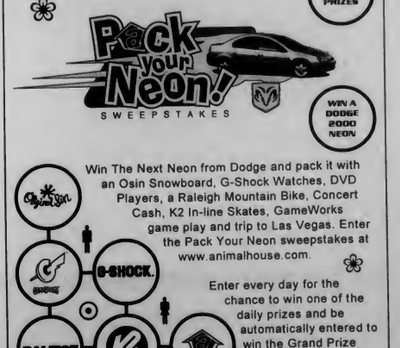
"The game we played Penn State it was like sweet revenge for me. It was one of the schools I was looking at and they said I was too short. I scored four goals against them but our team was also playing so good. We played against a nationally-ranked team and almost beat them and it was the best game for me personally and team-wise," Korutz said.

Anderson recalls one of her best team-oriented moments when UMass finally downed rival Harvard in the first game of the year in the 1998 season.

"My most memorable moment at UMass was our first game last year against Harvard, when we went into overtime and we pulled it out 13-12. It was a great way to start off and it was the greatest game I've ever played in," Anderson said.

One of the most exciting personal triumphs for the senior midfielder came against another Ivy League rival this year.

"Against Brown it made me feel good that I could go to goal, because the team never really looked at me that way. I was always a good defensive player and only went to goal once or twice in a game, but my offense has improved and I think that game showed that," Anderson said.



The two seniors have also had an extended role in leadership due to the laundry list of injuries the team has suffered this year, especially to its defense, where Anderson has had to increase her role as a team leader.

"I think that the whole team has done a good job of dealing with the injuries. Our bench players have done a good job of filling in where the defenders that went down played. I think in terms of me I just try and get out there and pump everybody up. The juniors have also done a really good job of assuming some of the leadership roles. Everybody did their part," Anderson said.

While the seniors have plans for after graduation, including graduate school and possibly coaching, their goals for this season are still thoroughly intact.

"We have two big games this weekend, hopefully we will pull them out, and then go to A-10's; of course everyone wants to win A-10's. That would be a big thing for us, because we just got into it this year," Anderson said.

Students unite at seder

By Lenny Holston and Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Apathy. Lack of universal education. Basic human needs that go unmet. Poisoning of our earth. Denial of human rights. Disease. Extremes in poverty and wealth. Social intolerance. Ravages of war. The misuse of technology.

Overcoming these 10 modern plagues was the challenge of more than 50 members of the campus community who gathered last night to affirm their belief in equality.

The 1999 University of Massachusetts Freedom Seder was the forum for their message, which was a celebration of the freedom from oppression.

Organized by the Black Student Union (BSU), Jewish Student Union (JSU) and the Office of Jewish Affairs, the freedom Seder took a traditional Jewish ritual and broadened its spectrum.

"We attempted to show the parallel history of our struggles," said Dan Kapner, JSU vice president of Social Action and Community Service.

Crossing boundaries and making connections, BSU Treasurer Cornelius Harris began the seder with the ha'lekhamo, the Hebrew prayer said at an event taking place for the first time.

Working their way through the traditional order, participants read poetry, told stories of struggle and freedom and enacted Jewish rituals.

When the Jews were fleeing Egypt, they took their bread which did not have time to rise or leaven. Matzah is an unleavened bread that is eaten during seders in this tradition. Traditionally, a piece of middle matzah, afikomen, is hidden and given through a seder for children to find. This is done for the children's entertainment when their attention starts to wander. France, a 12-year-old African-American girl, found the afikomen and won a dollar.

Kolot, a Jewish a cappella group, sang "Shir Lashalom (Song of Peace)," a poem said by the late Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin shortly before his assassination. The group closed their performance by singing "Teva Medley."

Jewish and African-American students eat dinner during their Freedom Seder last night at the Mullins Center.

Following Kolot, the African-American a capella group Nostalgia sang "kos," a song they said inspired them musically and emotionally. They also performed a rendition of Stevie Wonder's classic "Love's in Need."

"We all have to connect," said Nostalgia member Reymond Jourdan. "Connecting and communicating is the first step."

"We want to have more of these dinners," said JSU President Shira Huti. "What we are trying to do is to bring awareness of different cultures to us, as well as have other cultures become more aware of us."

Dr. Barbara Love led everyone in the song "This Little Light of Mine," which featured a verse dedicated to the crisis in Kosovo. The night closed with the Wu-Tang Clan's song "Never Again," which graphically depicts the Holocaust and rehukes the atrocity.

"We need more events like this," said Julie Zuckerman, the UMass Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow. "I wish more RSOs would get involved. This is a great jumping-off point, now many here tonight will see [units] is possible."

The haggadah, or book which details the order of the seder, ended with the quote "There are only two lasting bequests that we can leave to our children: one is roots, the other is wings."

Last night's seder seemed to represent the wings.

"This is the foundation," Kapner said. "This is day one of the solution."

The best education is at the U of Life

With all of the controversy involving the recent shootings in Littleton, Colo., it is surprising that Americans seem surprised when such incidents occur. I recall the killing of a black man in Texas who was dragged to his death because of the color of his skin. Or how about the incident in Wyoming, where a student was brutally beaten, tied to a pole and then left to die because he was gay." Why is it that we are always there to pick up the pieces, but don't do anything to try to prevent these things from happening?

Carnell Freeman

Here's a scenario: you're in class listening to your professor go on and on about some topic pertaining to the reading you did the night before — which you didn't do. You're bored. Your mind starts to drift off into another world. You look out the window and watch the people as they pass by. Some walk alone, while others walk in groups of two or three. You glance back to the clock, hoping your daydream took up enough time and maybe class will be over soon. You realize you have 30 long minutes before class is over and your mind starts to wander again.

"What if one of the guys had used the word 'nigger' in class and everyone laughed, would it have been appropriate then?"

You look at the teacher standing at the front of the room mumbling on, and all you can think about are one of those Charlie Brown cartoons where the teacher says, "Wa wa wa, wa wa," and you laugh to yourself. You look at the person next to you, a girl drifting in and out of a deep sleep. Her head slowly moves back, eyes closed, then a quick jerk as she reminds herself to WAKE UP!

In front of you are two guys talking about the night before. One guy says, "Hey, did you hear about Josh and those two girls last night?"

"No," says the other guy.

"We were at this party and these two hot chicks were talking to him. I mean these girls were hot, and Josh didn't even try to get their numbers," the first guy says.

"How do you know he didn't get their numbers?" says the other guy.

"I know because I was standing there watching, and he ended up walking away to go talk to some dude," the first guy says.

At this point the conversation is getting louder and people in the class start to look over at the two guys talking.

"Well, maybe Josh didn't know that the girls were interested in him. Maybe they were sisters," says the other guy.

"Dude, these girls were not sisters. One was black and the other one was white," the two guys laugh together. "And I know for a fact they were interested. I could tell. Josh was just being a fag," says the first guy.

Suddenly, the class begins to laugh, including the professor. There are a select few that don't laugh. You realize you are one of the people who is not laughing. Your mind starts to race. You wonder if you should say something. Your mouth begins to open in an effort to speak, but you are overcome by fear. What are you going to say? What will people think of you if you say speak up? You know that if you say something people will automatically think you are gay or one of those people who are always trying to be politically correct. And so you say nothing.

At the end of class, when everyone has left the room, you approach the professor, unsure of what you are going to say. You notice the professor is white [like all of your other professors] and hesitate for a moment.

You say: "I was wondering if you overheard those two guys talking?"

"Yes," says the professor, "Guys seem to find my class very boring sometimes."

"Well, I was wondering why you didn't say anything," you say.

"Say anything. About what?" the professor asks.

"One of the guys mentioned the word fag and I thought it was strange you didn't say anything," you say.

"I didn't think it was my place to comment," the professor says.

And as if the words seemed to flow from your mouth, you say, "What if one of the guys had used the word 'nigger' in class and everyone laughed, would it have been appropriate then?"

The professor starts to look uncomfortable. "I don't think anyone would use that word, honestly. Those kinds of things happen rarely at this school. But if using the word 'fag' offends you, I will say something the next time I hear it.

You kindly thank the professor and walk away angrily, trying not to believe this ever happened. You try to think of things to make this incident less painful. You remember that one of the two guys was gay.

It was at a Pride Alliance meeting you went to at the beginning of the semester. He was sitting alone wearing a Pride bracelet on his arm. You think to yourself how seldom these kinds of issues are discussed in classes and think, "I learned a lesson today that no teacher will ever teach."

My point is, you never know who you are talking to. It could be someone who is gay, straight, bisexual, bi-racial, or even someone from the Trench Coat Mafia (for lack of a better example).

I believe that the reason incidents — such as those in Colorado, Wyoming, or even Texas — happen is not because people are insane, need attention, or are white. I believe these incidents stem from simple conversations, such as the ones in class where the professor says, "Those kinds of things happen rarely at this school," and does nothing about it.

Carnell Freeman is a UMass student.

A 10 year-old wrote in to a recent newspaper, "Dear Editor, am I going to grow up doing bad things to other people like they did in Colorado and in other countries?" Let us learn from what has happened in our world. People fear what they are not educated about. Become educated, get involved, meet that new face, introduce yourself, smile, laugh and live in peace with yourself and those around you! We need to remember to keep the peace!

End to Jamaican crisis

By Lloyd Williams
Associated Press

KINGSTON, Jamaica — Jamaica's prime minister says his government is ready to back down on a proposed increase in gas prices that sparked deadly riots and brought business on the island to a near standstill.

Prime Minister P.J. Patterson named a chairman to a special parliamentary committee that he said may advise a rollback on the planned gas tax. The panel was to make its recommendations to the government by Sunday so they can be considered by Patterson's Cabinet the following day, he said.

The announcement appeared likely to calm Jamaicans, who erupted in fury after the government proposed $100 million in new taxes, most by a 30-percent levy on gas that raised prices from $1.55 per gallon to $2.

Schools and shops reopened today and roads were clear of debris from riots that killed six people this week.

Fiery roadblocks, looting and shootings forced businesses and schools to shut down. The violence also spurred fears of a further decline in Jamaica's tourist industry, already suffering from a spate of recent attacks on visitors, including the killing of a German tour operator.

The latest unrest led several airlines and three cruise ships Wednesday to cancel trips to the Caribbean island nation, a destination for up to 2 million tourists each year.

The gas tax will be a joke compared to the money we are going to lose in tourism," resort owner Gordon Stewart said.

The last two Jamaican governments to significantly raise gas prices fell from power, and there were deadly gas price riots in 1979 and 1985.

Before Patterson's announcement, Jamaicans blocked major roads with burning barricades of tires and furniture Wednesday, defying police who fired warning shots and tear gas. Some parts of the island suffered blackouts and telephone interruptions.

But a march Wednesday afternoon in Kingston called by the opposition Jamaica Labor Party was peaceful.

The special panel considering the gas tax will be led by Peter Moses, head of Citibank in Jamaica and president of a business group made up of manufacturers, importers and exporters. Moses has already indicated his opposition to the new taxes.

Patterson noted that the government would have to cut its budget or find another source of revenue if it does not impose the gas tax.

The proposed tax package was aimed at helping restore the lost money of some two million depositors in failed banks, 500,000 policyholders in collapsed insurance companies and 55,000 pensioners.

Still, Labor Party leader Edward Seaga warned today that protesters would take to the streets again if Patterson's proposal did not lead to a scrapping of the proposed gas tax.

The first fatality of the protests was identified as Brenda Duncan, a 28-year-old pregnant woman who police said was shot Tuesday by a private security guard fending off looters.

A soldier was also killed during a clash with protesters, apparently shot by police.

Four other people died of gunshot wounds at Kingston Public Hospital, said Carlene Nugent, a hospital official.

She said the hospital had admitted 23 people by Wednesday, most with gunshot wounds and some in critical condition, including a police officer who was shot in the face Monday.

In the northern resort town of Montego Bay, where riots kept tourists confined to their hotels and beaches Monday, there appeared to be a slow recovery.

Some hotels reported cancellations, and one said some tourists were stranded when British Airways canceled flights to Jamaica on Tuesday. But Dionne Montiff, manager of Montego Bay's exclusive Half Moon Hotel, said "normality has been restored."

Storytelling festival to visit Amherst area

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

"Little folk" to "older folk" are expected at Amherst College this weekend to hear stories from around the world as part of a storytelling festival.

Five nationally-known storytellers will be part of the day- long "Keepers of the Word" festival Saturday in the Amherst College Campus Center Frontroom.

The storytellers will be "keeping their words" with stories from nearly every continent, performed together three times during the day.

The "once upon a time"s begin with "Stories for Little Folk and the People Who Love Them," from 10-11:30 a.m. Then "Stories for Young Folk and the People Who Love Them" will be from 2-4 p.m. and the day will be ending happily ever after with "Stories for Older Folk and the People Who Love Them," will be from 8-10 p.m.

The five storytellers, Onawumi Jean Mars, Geraldina Lawson, Raoul Mama, Anne Shimojima and Ed Stivender, won't just be entertaining — the stories are interwoven with moral lessons, spirituality and music, among other elements.

Mass associate dean of students at Amherst College, is the founder and director of the festival. She will be performing stories from Africa and other cultures that "encourage pride of heritage, appreciation of cultural differences and recognition of kinship," according to a press release.

Chicana-American storyteller Lawson is scheduled to perform her bilingual stories, which she has been collecting and creating since childhood. Lawson's material will be on the lighter side with humorous, gossipy tales as well as "timeless stories that entertain and illuminate," the press release stated.

Mama, a native of Benin, West Africa who now lives in Storrs, Conn., and will be drawing on African cultures while telling stories that "celebrate acts of generosity, respect for elders and care for others." Mama is also the author of Why Goats Smell Bad and Other Stories from Benin, a collection of folktales acclaimed by School Library Journal.

Shimojima, who teaches college-level storytelling courses and is a library media specialist in addition to being a nationally-recognized storyteller, will be performing folktales from Asia, Europe and North America. Shimojima may be a favorite during the later performances as "she has won the admiration of youthful and adult listeners," stated the press release.

Music will be in the air as Stivender takes the stage Saturday. The Philadelphia native incorporates a banjo and harmonica into his traditional and scriptural stories. According to a press release, Stivender has been called the "Robin Williams of storytelling" and the "Catholic Garrison Keillor."

Tickets for the performances are available at the Amherst College Campus Center Office. The cost for adults is $5 for the first two performances and $8.50 for the last performance. For children under 12 and senior citizens, each performance costs $3.50. For adults and children wishing to attend both of the first two performances tickets are $7.50 for adults and $5.25 for children. All the performances are free to Amherst College students with identification.

Sponsors include the Amherst College Student Finance Committee, Office of the Dean of Students, academic departments and supporters throughout Amherst College.

Men's track off to Penn Relays

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

The track and field world has its eyes focused on the University of Pennsylvania for the annual Penn Relays. Some of the premier programs in the country come in for this two-day event. Top schools like Louisiana State University and the University of Texas will be sending their best athletes to Philadelphia for an invitation only extravaganza.

"Only the cream of the crop will be there," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said.

UMass will send a squad of nine competitors to the City of Brotherly Love on Wednesday with Assistant Coach Elizabeth Zimney, so that LaFreniere can prepare the rest of her team for the upcoming Atlantic 10 Championships which will be held in Blacksburg, Va. on the Virginia Tech campus.

The 4 x 100 relay team looks to be the highlight of the Minutewomen this season. The team of Rose Bryan, Abby Rubino, Raquiel Shelton and Shelanda Irish have faced fierce competition, and not only have risen to the level of their competition, but excelled there. The senior-dominated quartet has a strong grasp on its role, and looks to be in full stride for its upcoming challenge. The team has already qualified for ECAC competition.

UMass will also be entering a distance medley relay team which consists of Kristin Ciesowski, running the 1200 meter; Irish, 400 meters; Melissa Henderson, 800 meters; and Nicole Way, 1600 meters.

The Minutewomen have Irish and Rubino competing in the long jump. Irish has qualified for the ECAC's and Rubino has found herself a spot in the New England Championships. The triple jump features another ECAC qualifier in Bryan. Bryan is coming off her ECAC qualifying jump of a little over 14 feet in the UConn Invitational last weekend and is on a hot streak of late.

Alison Fostevin and Carole LaPlante will also test their skills in the shot-put competition. The duo took home third and fourth respectively at the aforementioned UConn Invitational.

"Everyone is striving to do their best," LaFreniere said.

The Penn Relays provides a forum to display their individual accomplishments against the best possible competitors from all over the country. Experience and desire to excel is what UMass brings to the table, and if that counts for anything the Minutewomen will always come out on top.

UM off to A-10's

By James Piehl and Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Staff

The regular season is over for the Massachusetts men's tennis team and it is now setting its sights on the postseason in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

The seedings aren't definite yet, but it appears the Minutemen will be a No. 5 seed going into Blacksburg, Va. It is projected that UM will be facing the University of Dayton, most likely the No. 4 seed. The Minutemen previously faced the Flyers earlier in the season, losing 5-2 in a disappointing match.

The Minutemen finished up the season with two straight victories against Fordham and Seton Hall. Both were quality wins for the club, as they beat the programs 6-1 and 5-2, respectively.

The play of senior Todd Cheney has been especially exceptional. Starting off the spring with a 2-7 singles record, Cheney has since caught fire, winning his last 7 of 8 five matches. The recent streak puts the senior within two victories of the singles record for UMass.

His singles play has only been bettered by his outstanding doubles record. Cheney and junior Bo Navarro have teamed to form a intimidating tandem that is on a six-match winning streak. Cheney currently holds the all-time record for wins in doubles matches, set against Dayton.

Sophomore walk-on Bill Greener will look to continue his outstanding effort at the No. 6 singles position. Since being vaulted into a starting role because of the loss of Fabian Rabanal due to a broken sacrum, Greener has been nothing short of phenomenal. With a current singles record of 5-2, Greener's impact has been a welcome surprise to the hardships and difficulty of the season.

The expectations for freshman transfer Steve Prisco were very high at the beginning of the spring, as he was immediately placed into a No. 1 starting role. However, Prisco's season has been an unexpected roller coaster ride. When he is at the peak of his game, he appears to be unstoppable, but at the low times he finds himself struggling to compete.

The Minutemen are hoping Prisco will find his confidence going into the A-10's. All year long he has been competing against seniors and juniors, and this experience will undoubtedly help his development into an eventual leader for the team.

Roh Manchester has turned out another well-rounded year and returns as an all-conference player. He is 3-00 on both the singles and doubles circuits with 8-8 records and currently holds a two-match winning streak in singles.

If the Minutemen come away with a victory against Dayton, they will face the probable No. 1 seed, Virginia Tech. The Hokies are playing host to this year's tournament and have won the championship the past three years. The Minutemen are hoping to end that streak and start one of their own.

Women's crew prepped to go for Atlantic 10 finals

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts women's crew coach Jim Dietz issued a challenge to his underachieving team after it suffered its second straight loss.

Perhaps it's too late already to bring the team to NCAA's. Perhaps it's too late to turn around the season that has taken such an odd twist. But this Saturday, Dietz wants his team to bring the winning mentality with them to New Jersey to defend the Atlantic 10 title for the fourth straight year. It's now or never as far as Dietz is concerned.

"I will be surprised if we didn't win the championship," he said.

Last year, UMass, who won six out of nine events and broke five records, came before second place George Washington convincingly. The Minutewomen, then, went on to the nationals and placed fourth overall. This year they could probably forget about the trip to California, where the NCAA Championships will be held. However, there are still hopes.

"Right now we are in the bubble, we don't know where it is going to go," Dietz said.

But whether they will make the trip or not, Dietz wanted the Minutewomen to bring it together and end the season with a strong run.

"Psychologically, they don't have it to race [to win for the past two meets]. We have more losses this year than we have combined in every other year since I got here. We've never taken the losses like [the way] we've taken this year," Dietz said. "[But hopefully] they will be prepared for this weekend. The question is, how prepared they will be."

Dietz said he wouldn't worry about the opponents in the A-10 this year since they haven't shown a lot of speed, but both Temple and George Washington do not seem to plan for a roll over.

Temple has most of their personnel back for this year, and head coach Jamie Gordon hopes to build on that.

"The team kept improving as the season went along," Gordon said in a press release. "We will be healthier this year and should be able to make a strong run at the Atlantic 10 Championship."

Even though George Washington has lost a large number of rowers to graduation, Head Coach Steve Peterson remained optimistic.

"I believe in the basics. Results on race day should come as no surprise. If you have done your homework, you will win. We will do the work necessary to win," Peterson said in a press release.

This is not a joke. The competition will be feisty, but Dietz has a plan of his own.

"The second novice eights will make all the difference by winning the point trophy [for the team]," Dietz said. "We are hoping to take the top place in lightweigh four, and that will add another six points [to the total team points].

"Varsity eight should win. Even with a bad row, they should win. We are hoping they can turn in a good row because I don't think they have yet."

UM men's track making great strides

By Erik Haan
Collegian Correspondent

The building of a champion — it is one of the most enjoyable experiences to witness in sports.

Watching a team rise to the top and seeing them steadily improve upon each successive performance marks the ascension from an average or good team to a legitimate, bona fide winner.

The Massachusetts men's track and field team is one such example of this. The Minutemen are a collection of finely- tuned performers, who are wearing the Maroon and White with pride. They do their best to show their competition what it's like representing the University of Massachusetts.

Case in point — The Florida Relays, which were held in late March. Vic Morency, who is arguably the cornerstone of the Minutemen, started off his season with a flourish.

The junior smashed the school record for the javelin throw, outdistancing the reigning king by seven feet, and joining teammate B.J. Cardoza as a record-breaker.

Cardoza shattered UMass' best mark in the hammer throw by six feet — and this was only in the preseason.

The following week, at the University of Pennsylvania Invitational, Massachusetts built upon its impressive performance and came out of the first official meet of the season with a second-place finish.

Morency was a double-winner this time, taking both the javelin and the discus in impressive fashion. Cardoza was a top finisher again.

Additionally, Tom Toye stepped in and contributed, with a second-place finish in the 200-meter dash. The team was gaining strength.

The Minutemen got even better the next time out, as they smoked Out of Storrs, Conn. in a first-place flurry. Morency proved consistent as a double-winner, while Cardoza had once again victorious.

Toye was also a double winner. Others, like Dan Ledoux and Ben Baraldi, stepped up with first-place finishes themselves. The pieces were coming together, and more would be added the following week as Massachusetts featured even more first-place finishers at the Bucknell Invite.

This weekend they are taking their momentum with them to Philadelphia and competing in the Penn Relays. If past performance is any indication of future results, this team should be looking forward to a very pleasant bus ride home.

Washington University awards five half scholarships to its program.

The key to the tournament will be the semifinals when the Minutewomen will meet Illinois-Chicago. The Owls head into the weekend as the No. 3 seed. Dixon feels that TU will be a tough matchup for her squad.

"This is a match where there is no clear-cut favorite," Dixon said. "There's no difference in talent, when we faced them in the fall, they were really unfocused and we were very focused."

According to Dixon, the key to the match against the Owls will be the singles, but doubles play is also a concern.

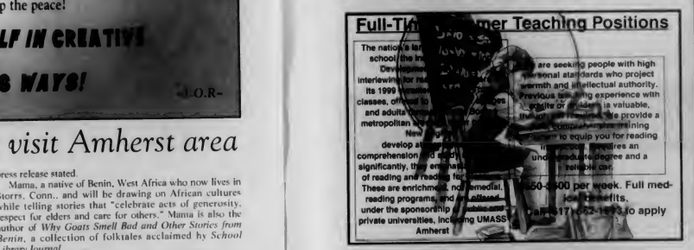
"They are very good in the one through five slots," she said. "But, if we come out of the singles four [games] to two, then we have a great shot at the be a war as well."

Dixon has been preparing her team for the A-10 tournament since the winter season started.

"I've been telling the girls the whole time that the reason that we're playing all these teams ranked so high was to prepare us for the championships," she said.

While the winter season was geared towards the preparation for the A-10's, the spring season has had the team looking towards the showdown with the Owls.

"Everything since Feb. 28th has been for the game against Temple," Dixon said. "This is the most important match of the year for us."



Ola Gerasimova

Should the Minutewomen defeat Temple, they will go on to play in the championship which will take place at noon on Sunday, April 25. The most likely opponent for UMass will be the host team, Virginia Tech.

"Virginia Tech is far and away the best team in the conference," Dixon said. "They have three all-conference players and they will be a tough opponent for us."

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — It's time to make room for something more in your life by letting go of some of that emotional baggage. A close friend can point the way.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Sharing thoughts and feelings with those around you today can surely benefit all concerned, provided you do not come off as reluctant or guarded.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — The specter of something threatening from your own past is likely to vanish today, leaving you free to pursue goals with renewed interest.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — This is a good day to trust a whim and indulge in something that may not be good for you at any other time. Support is forthcoming.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You don't want others to spot your weaknesses today. Take care that the impression you do give, however, is not one of unnecessary arrogance.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — If you've got it, flaunt it, but take care you don't let others take undue advantage of you. Someone you don't know may be looking for you.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Now is not the time to insist that others conform to your own expecta-tions. You must be willing to learn from the differences you observe.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Stick to the basics today and you will enjoy yourself as fully as possible. It's when things get compli-cated that you may encounter trou-ble.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may have to put things in writing in order to be fully under-stood today. Guard against being prodded or cajoled at this time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may have to wait for more information today before you can press ahead. Never fear, you'll be able to use the time to your advan-tage.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You're feeling a new sense of power today, particularly when it comes to telling it like it is. At times, however, you must hold your tongue.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Your grasp of the obvious will hold you in good stead today. However, you must now be willing to grapple with more complex issues.

UM hits road to play Rams

Atlantic 10 plot could thicken as team heads to Bronx

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team is facing a huge three-game series this weekend when it travels to the Bronx to battle Fordham University.

The Minutemen currently sit all alone atop the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division with a 7–2 record, and hold a three game lead over their next closest competitor.

One of the teams which is still in the thick of things, however, is the Rams.

Despite carrying only a 4–5 conference mark into this weekend, Fordham is still in striking distance of UMass.

In fact, after finishing behind the Minutemen in the A-10 East last season, the Rams went on to win the conference tournament and earned the automatic bid into the NCAA tourney.

With a three-game sweep over Fordham, UMass would practically lock up the A-10 East crown.

The Minutemen have won seven straight conference games, including sweeps over Xavier and Temple in the past two weekends.

UMass coach Mike Stone, however, isn't looking past Fordham just yet.

"It's too early to be thinking about anything ourselves. We've got to approach this as if we're right in the middle of everyone," he said. "There's still four weekends to go in the season, and we're not packing our bags to go anywhere just yet."

The Minutemen swept a three-game set from the Rams last year in Amherst, but Fordham will be looking to return the favor at home in the Bronx.

"Fordham is the defending A-10 tournament champs. They went to the NCAA's last year and we've got to be ready for them," Stone said.

What the Maroon and White do have on their side is momentum. UMass is the winner of four in a row, including an 11–8 come-from-behind victory over Vermont on Wednesday.

"Things have been going good. We've won four in a row and the team seems to be coming together now," said UMass first baseman/outfielder Gavin Clark, who belted the game-winning home run against the Catamounts on Wednesday.

"Everything seems to be coming together now."

The Minutemen will send pitchers Bill Cooke and Travis Veracka to the hill this weekend, with David Loonie penciled in as the likely starter on Sunday.

Cooke is only one win away from tying Jason Bennett for the UMass career record for victories.

Offensively for the Minutemen, outfielder Aaron Braunstein continues to be the team's biggest power threat.

He connected for his eighth home run of the year on Wednesday, and fourth in four games. He is batting .352 and leads the team in RBIs as well.

Other top threats for UMass include freshman Mike Kulak (.395), redshirt freshman Scott Anderson (.330), catcher/designated hitter Chris Morgan (.328), junior second baseman Shaun Skeffington (.315) and seniors Bryan Mazzaferro (.311) and Brian Samela (.309).

Men's lacrosse to take on 15th ranked Notre Dame

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (4–4) will seek to borrow the luck of the leprechaun tomorrow as it hosts No. 15 Notre Dame (6–5) at Garber Field with a 2 p.m. faceoff.

The contest represents the seventh time this season the Minutemen will face a team currently ranked in the Top 20.

Thus far, UMass has come up empty in those opportunities, while the Fighting Irish have managed one lucky victory over Butler, 8–7.

Similarly, UMass, Notre Dame played competitively with No. 1 Limestone, as well as two of the nation's premiere programs in the country, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella said.

"They have fared comparatively with them, so we feel very evenly matched coming into the game."

After falling to three of the toughest squads in the nation (Butler, Duke, Loyola consecutively), the Minutemen were able to halt their skid at Harvard on Wednesday.

"Getting a win after such an extended period of time helps our team tremendously right now," Cannella said.

"The team had been preparing and playing well but coming up empty, so [the Harvard game] definitely gave us a boost."

UMass leads the all-time series 4–0 with their foes from South Bend, Ind., with all but one of the previous encounters being decided by one goal.

The most recent battle was an 8–7 Minutemen win at Notre Dame last year.

The biggest margin of victory was three, an 8–5 UMass conquest in 1996.

"Every time we have played these guys, it has been a thriller," Cannella said. "I expect nothing less this Saturday— they are a very intense team that prides itself on hustling."

Aside from its high level of determination, the Notre Dame squad has also been successful at finding the back of the net, outscoring opponents 117–93 this year.

Leading the way has been sophomore David Ulrich, who has posted 14 goals and 25 assists for 39 points. His 2.27 assists per game average places him sixth in the nation.

Fellow second-year player Tom Glatzel is second in team scoring, with 23 goals and 10 assists for 33 points.

Senior attack Chris Dusseau has matched Glatzel's goal output at 23, including a superb five-goal effort in the team's recent 14–7 romp over Army.

"Notre Dame is playing very well right now," Cannella said. "They have a lot of offensive weapons that we will be constantly checking."

Kirk Howell has provided stability in goal for the Irish, as he ranks 11th in the country in goals against average (8.27), and 17th in save percentage (.582).

On face-offs, Kevin Higgins will likely match up with David Kramer from the Minutemen in many of the midfield battles.

Higgins has swiped 52 percent of the draws he has taken (104–199).

Kramer and his mates have vastly improved this facet of the game, with recent decisions over Harvard and Loyola to their credit.

Softball squad ready to play URI

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

There is a big difference between being youthful and being inexperienced.

Rhode Island will look at their scouting reports before tomorrow's 12 p.m. doubleheader contest in Kingston, R.I., with the Massachusetts softball team and see that the UMass team boasts many freshmen in its starting lineup.

The Rams should also look at the fact that the predominately youthful team has accumulated a plethora of experience in the first 40 games of the season.

"I do have a young team," admitted Sortino. "We have seven newcomers and we have 11 underclassmen, but this does not feel like a young softball team to me. They are very, very, very guns."

"I think they have played in a lot of big games in all these tournaments we have played in [including] two championship games in two of the tournaments we went to. It has given us a great wealth of experience for our young people. They have played very well. They play good tough-nose softball."

That experience has come at the hands of opposition that is geared towards knocking off one of the top softball teams in the nation. This is part of the territory that comes with having a successful record and dominating opponents.

"We are the biggest game on everyone's schedule in the Northeast," Sortino said. "We are certainly the biggest game on everyone's conference schedule. Every day is a new challenge."

Part of the confidence that conference teams bring to challenge the Minutewomen stems from a loss earlier this month to St. Joseph's, Atlantic 10 teams can build upon that disappointing doubleheader and believe that if they play their best game of the season they have a shot at winning.

"I think that everyone looked at that loss and probably thought that there was an Achilles heel within us," Sortino said. "Truth be told, we went down there and we didn't play good UMass softball. St. Joe's played very well. I think that it definitely gave people the idea that there is an opportunity to catch us on the right day. It also was a great wake-up call for us."

The team has certainly woken up since then. They have rattled off 12 straight wins in dominating fashion behind a combination of excellent pitching and timely hitting as they re-established what UMass softball means.

The Maroon and White must be weary of letting their guard down against the Rams though, because they have even more riding on this game then just to knock UMass down a notch.

"Rhode Island will come at us with everything they have," Sortino said. "They are fighting for a spot in the conference tournament. We stand in their way. Every game is seriously significant to them.

"They are well-coached. I think they will come at us with good pitching, good hitting, and good defense. And plus we are playing them in their house and I don't think we will be treated as guests."

Korutz & Anderson bid fairwell to Totman with a huge A-10 set

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Seniors Laura Korutz and Melissa Anderson will be leading the Massachusetts lacrosse team on to Ruth I. Totman field two last times this weekend when they face Virginia Tech (7–5, 2–1 in the Atlantic 10) today at 3:30 p.m. and Duquesne (10–4, 2–2 in A-10) on Sunday afternoon.

"We've had somewhat of a roller coaster ride this season. We had a nice weekend of play last week, hopefully we can maintain that. I would hope that they can get up for their last home weekend," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "We have a good record at home and hopefully that will help us."

These two Minutewomen (7–5, 2–1 in A–10), who are one and two in team scoring, will be crucial as they face their last two A–10 opponents before heading back to Philadelphia for the A–10 tournament. Most importantly their A–10 tournament fate hangs in the balance in these two games.

"Both players have played a real unique role for our team," McClellan said. "They [Korutz and Anderson] have been doing a good job of just coming out and playing every game. We still have a couple of weekends before us, but we got a game on Friday and Sunday, so we just have to come and take care of business."

Korutz, the senior attack, has collected 16 goals and eight assists for 24 points, while also retrieving 23 ground balls during the 11 games she played in this season. She will be a driving force for the Minutewomen as they end their regular season this weekend.

"Laura is a quarterback this year. Jen Bowen really taught her the ropes, and she's a smart and creative player, which complements my coaching style, so we are really compatible in that respect," McClellan said. "She gives us a lot of communication out there... setting things up. That's been critical for us, and when she's not in the line-up you notice."

Anderson, who controls the midfield for UMass, has also done a great job this year creating offense when called upon. The Syracuse, N.Y. native has buried 20 goals, which leads the team, while collecting two assists. She has 22 points which ties her with Gorski for second on the team in points.

Women's water polo set for ECAC's

By Lawrence Redford
Collegian Staff

As the weekend approaches, the No. 9 ranked Massachusetts women's water polo team is heading to Cambridge for the Eastern Conference Athletic Championships. The Minutewomen are the defending ECAC champions, and boast an impressive 19–6 record thus far.

Despite the record, and being the defending champs, the team has come to the realization they are no longer the team to beat. With losses to Princeton and Maryland this year the team has lost that aura of invincibility. Maryland and Princeton have improved enough to beat UMass this year.

"We're not on top any more," All-America Katie Grogan said. "They [Maryland and Princeton] are now the teams to beat, and we've got to show up ready to play if we want to win."

For the Minutewomen the road to the championship will not be easy, and that has come across loud and clear in this week's practices.

"At practice this week the intensity level was higher than it's ever been," said junior Laurie Edwards.

While the team is still a power in women's water polo, at least one of the Minutewomen sees this as huge opportunity.

"This is our chance to prove to the nation how good we really are," Edwards said.

Junior Marci Hupp, however, played down the fact that UMass has losses to Maryland and Princeton this year, and is making sure that the Minutewomen do not look too far ahead.

"We have other teams to worry about too, like Nova and Harvard. We can't just focus on Princeton and Maryland," Hupp said. "There may be a bit of a revenge factor, but we have to win four games to get to the championship."

The Minutewomen will have to beat at least two of the aforementioned teams en route to a successful defense of their Eastern Conference Championship.

UMass coach Dan McOsker does not believe that his team is a favorite or an underdog.

"Princeton, Maryland and us are all equally seeded, and it is going to come down to whoever wants it the most," said McOsker of the upcoming tournament.

The Minutewomen have a difficult road to the championship with both Maryland and Princeton having exceptional seasons. According to McOsker, the team has played well throughout the season, but is still holding in its best performance.

"We still have not played our best game," McOsker said.

That elusive best game will have to be played this weekend if the Minutewomen's season is to progress.

Women's tennis off to A–10's

The Massachusetts women' tennis team will make its annual trip to the Atlantic 10 Championships this weekend. The Minutewomen will head into the tournament as the No. 2 seed, which means the team will draw a weaker team when it takes the court at noon today in Blacksburg, Va.

"It will be nice for us to go in as a favorite for a change," UMass coach Judy Dixon said, "We are sick of being the underdog heading into the A–10's."

The team hopes to at least achieve a repeat of last year's performance, where the team came home with a second place finish behind only Virginia Tech.

"We are trying to re–establish ourselves," Dixon said. "At the very least we are looking to repeat our second place finish [from last year]."

Dixon felt that last year's team really overachieved with its success at the championships.

"Last year's finish was phenomenal," Dixon said. "Especially since we are not a fully–funded program, like Virginia Tech."

UMass only has three full scholarships compared to eight for Virginia Tech, Temple University gives out six full rides and George

Student organized tournament made Hoopla on Haigis

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The ninth annual New Balance Haigis Hoopla arrived at the University of Massachusetts Haigis Mall this weekend as teams competed for the title in their division.

The event was organized and directed by 25 Sport Management students who have been preparing for the nationwide event since the beginning of the semester. More than 100 volunteers helped with the event as court monitors and referees.

More than 400 teams, consisting of four skill divisions and five age divisions, competed to win the New Balance Championship Award in each division. According to the Sport Management Department, this year was the largest team turnout at Haigis Hoopla.

The skill divisions ranged from highest to lowest and included the Top Gun Division, Hot Shots, Weekend Warriors and Couch Potatoes. Age level divisions included, from highest to lowest, "Endorsed by No One," Wee Wonders, Playground Kings, Running Guns and Bomb Squad. Ages ranged from 10 and under, to 35 and up.

Last year, the Hoopla event was focused more on attracting women to participate in the event. This year, emphasis has been on creating a whiffleball tournament in which individuals could win prizes. A celebrity challenge also took place in which UMass Minutewoman's team members Tez Craft and Sabriya Mitchell faced off on separate teams. Also in the celebrity division was former UMass basketball player Rigoberto Nunez and his team, Boricuas on the Set, that took first place in the Hot Shot division.

Around 15,000 people attended the two day event to compete, watch and or just have something to do on the weekend.

The team "Holyoke Hurricanes" starring Chris Donah, Joey Prattico and Danny Jette showed up to play some good teams and to win some prizes.

"There's a lot more stuff to do if you're just waiting," Prattico said. "You can learn a lot from the older kids."

"It's fun when you're not playing because you can win prizes," Jette said. "I really liked playing teams I've never played before."

Sport Management department head Lisa Masteralexis said the Haigis frenzy is growing to a level even top competitors like the National Basketball Association (NBA) cannot equal. The NBA's annual "Hoop-It-Up" stopped coming to Springfield because it couldn't compete with the level of Haigis Hoopla, Masteralexis said.

Freshman hotel restaurant travel administration major Scott Lesser was impressed with the organization and success of the event.

"It's unbelievable how they can organize over 400 teams on 32 courts in a two-day span," Lesser said. "I think it's fun for everybody."

Refugees tell of killing as Serb TV is bombed

By George John
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — NATO warplanes knocked Serb television off the air again yesterday, and refugees fleeing Kosovo brought new reports of roaming Serb gunmen butchering villagers by the dozens.

In some of the grimmest accounts to emerge so far, Kosovo refugees reaching Macedonia yesterday told relief workers of Serb paramilitaries entering villages, ordering residents out of their homes and opening fire on them.

"It's very alarming," said Ron Redmond, a spokesman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

While Serbs had emptied southern towns with "clinical precision," the latest accounts depicted Serb paramilitaries combing more northerly villages and executing residents, Redmond said.

NATO leaders meeting at a summit in Washington said yesterday the allied campaign against Milosevic would succeed, and pledged military protection and economic aid to Yugoslavia's neighbors for standing with the West.

"The nations of the region have risked, and even faced, armed confrontation with Serbia by facilitating and supporting our campaign to end the bloodshed in Kosovo," President Clinton said. The Yugoslav news agency Tanjug called the three-day summit, which marked NATO's 50th anniversary, "a bloody birthday party" and labeled Clinton "the leader of the criminals."

NATO has targeted Serb TV as a key propaganda tool of Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic.

70,000 mourn for Columbine's victims

By Steven K. Paulson
Associated Press

LITTLETON, Colo. — Thirteen white doves fluttered in the slate gray sky yesterday, over the heads of 70,000 people who filled a parking lot to mourn the 12 students and one teacher massacred at Columbine High School.

Families, friends and strangers clung to each other during a 75-minute memorial service. They clutched flowers, blue and silver balloons and Bibles as they wept and wondered why it happened. "All of us must change our lives to honor these children," Vice President Al Gore told the overflow crowd a few blocks from where two teen-agers went on a rampage and then killed themselves Tuesday. "More than ever, I realize every one of us is responsible for all of the children.

"No society can be perfect, but we know the way things should be," Gore said, his voice thundering like a preacher's.

As Gov. Bill Owens read the name of each of the 13 victims, a dove was released. The symbol of peace had a special meaning: Columbine, Colorado's state flower, derives from a Latin word meaning "like a dove."

"God grant them eternal peace," Owens said of the victims. Mourners — twice as many as had been expected — stood in rapt attention as Gore described how children must be raised.

He never mentioned by name the two classmates, seniors Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, who went on the rampage and tried to blow up the high school apparently because they felt like rejected misfits.

Investigators have found a diary, plotting the mayhem in precise detail for more than a year, as well as bomb-making materials and weapons in one of the pair's bedroom.

"I would be misleading you if I said I understand this. I don't know why human beings do evil," Gore said.

"We must have the courage not to look away from those who feel despised and rejected," he said. "If you are a parent, they need your attention. If you are a grandparent, they need your time." Gore and retired Gen. Colin Powell lead an array of dignitaries surrounding the makeshift stage in the movie theater parking lot. The service was punctuated by songs performed by a variety of Christian entertainers, including Amy Grant, and student musicians. At 1:30 p.m., brothers Jonathan and Stephen Cohen opened the service with a simple "Hi," and sang a song they wrote in tribute to the massacre's victims.

Jonathan Cohen, a junior at Columbine, was trapped in the choir room when gunfire erupted. Stephen, a senior, was in the cafeteria where many students were shot or hit by shrapnel from pipe bombs. "Can you still hear raging guns ending dreams of precious ones?" they sang. "In God's sun, hope will come, his red stain will take our pain."

Roman Catholic Archbishop Charles Chaput of Denver opened the services with a prayer.

"Surely the past weeks is about as much suffering as any community can bear," Chaput said. "Love is stronger than death, I believe that. Perhaps beyond all this suffering, something good can be achieved."

Other dignitaries included U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard and most of the state's congressional delegation, and state officials, and the Rev. Franklin Graham, son of evangelist Billy Graham.

"In the face of an unimaginable evil, this community has drawn closer," the governor said. "The community has found in itself a tremendous healing power."

Mourners of all ages began arriving four hours before the service. For some, it was the second or third vigil they had attended since Tuesday's rampage. Many were Columbine High School alumni. One student painted a heart over his face in Columbine blue.

Music, speeches and six arrests mark eighth annual Extravaganja

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Marked as much by undercover police and arrests as by speakers and blaring bands, over 1,000 people converged on the Town Common Saturday for Extravaganja.

The nearly eight hour event was an "anti–prohibition" rally protesting the illegality of marijuana.

"We're really only here to break one law and that is the law we know is wrong," said Mycho Jellison to the crowd as master of ceremonies of the event. Jellison, who is also a University of Masschusetts senior, majoring in future of art through media technology, is a Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) member. "If we like physically go against the cops... they could shut us down."

Jellison was referring to a scuffle occuring earlier around 2 p.m. between two undercover Amherst police officers and a person at the rally.

"I was looking for them [undercover police officers]. I was looking for that guy [an undercover police officer] and he was like talking to the kid. [The kid] whips out a joint and the lady cop came up [to arrest him]," said Rich MacFarlnane, a security officer who said his job was to alert individuals speaking to undercover police officers, that they are speaking to the police.

The two undercover Amherst police officers brought the individual who was a male and a minor, against a car where he was handcuffed. A small group gathered around the officers, shouting things like "Go back to Serbia" and waving small American flags with marijuana leafs painted on them. The officers then walked with the individual across Boltwood Avenue from the Common to the front of the Lord Jeffery Inn.

The crowd, now swelling to about 25 individuals, followed the officers and the individual across the street shouting. The group surrounded the officers, appearing to try to pull the individual free as the officers were backed against the inn.

The individual broke loose and ran as the crowd shouted for him to do so. The individual ran with his hands behind his back still handcuffed, behind a neighboring Amherst College building and down a hill, circling back behind the buildings through a tall hedge into a garden behind the Inn.

"Some kid [was] running with his hands behind his back and everyone [was] running with him to protect him. Then it got kind of confusing. At a point a couple more police arrived on the scene," said an anonymous UMass student, who witnessed part of the incident.

One officer ran through the opposite side of the garden, toward the running boy. The boy turned around and ran out of the garden from that officer but there was a second officer running up behind him as he ran out of the garden. Then several other police officers in uniform came to the back of the Inn but the individual had already been caught. It was unclear where exactly the individual was caught.

The anonymous UMass student said at some point the individual was able to get the handcuffs off.

SAM dribbles raises money for AIDS charity

Support was raised for the Pediatric AIDS Research Foundation in the seventh annual "Bounce For Beats" which took place over the weekend at the University of Massachusetts Haigis Hoopla.

The fundraiser was organized by the Sigma Alpha Mu (SAM) fraternity. Funds were raised for the 24–hour period during which the brothers bounced a basketball non–stop.

All donations benefit AIDS research development and care for patients. The brothers have been raising pledges all week.

"We go around to different local businesses and also to people across campus," Adam Umina, president of SAM, said. "We try to raise as much money as possible for a great cause."

The hardest part of the fundraiser for the brothers was bouncing the basketball through the night. The SAM brothers started bouncing at the beginning of the Haigis Hoopla and didn't stop until the following morning at 8 a.m. "At night it gets cold and boring and grueling, but it's worth it at the end," Umina said.

All the brothers in the fraternity take turns bouncing the ball in shifts. There were four brothers assigned to a three hour shift, bouncing the ball for an average of 10–15 minutes at a turn.

Every SAM chapter across the country participates in "Bounce For Beats" which raises money through pledges for bouncing a ball for 24–hours straight.

Last year, they raised $850 and this year they're hoping to raise over $1,000.

Randy Miller, a SAM brother, said the AIDS Foundation will use the donated money in different ways.

"They'll disperse all the donated money to areas of the organization that need it most," Miller said.

Parade, Party raise awareness for Earth Day

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Amherst resident Anne Dolen helped to organize a celebration for the first Earth Day as a college student, and has celebrated it ever since.

She carried on that tradition yesterday, by bringing her family to the Amherst Earth Day Committee's Give Your Car a Break Celebration, which featured a festival in honor of the holiday.

"I'm trying to introduce my children to the ideas of ecology and respecting the environment," she said.

Dolen was one of many local residents who attended the celebration, which featured entertainment ranging from regional bands to a clown on stilts. The event was the culmination of Give Your Car a Break Week, in which commuters were encouraged to use alternative forms of transportation to prevent air pollution and excessive gasoline consumption.

"We're here to get awareness out to people that there's other ways of getting around, besides your car," said Jason Solle, the director of MASSPIRG's Clean Air Campaign. "People should pay attention to using a bus, or any other kind of transportation, rather than using a car."

Solle was one of several MASSPIRG members present at the parade, holding signs with slogans

Classic has pigs on parade and other student's animals

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts had the opportunity to showcase animals they groomed in the 64th Annual Bay State Livestock Classic at Hadley Farm Saturday.

The event, sponsored by the Animal Science Department and open to all undergraduates, has evolved over the past years to showcase a diversity of species.

Exhibitors entered in the Classic were required to spend a month prior to the event in which they would groom, condition, clip and clean their animals to emphasize the animal's individual qualities. In addition to handling their own animals, students were responsible for other animals in the ring.

During the Classic, the animals of different species were judged on their appearance and how well they respond to commands from their exhibitor. Awards were given out to individual exhibitors who had displayed outstanding grooming and showmanship.

There are three stages to the competition and they consist of the preliminary round, final round and premiere showperson round.

In the preliminaries, each contestant competes against other exhibitor's animals within the same class. The top two winners of each class go on to the final round. In the final round, the winner of each species advances to the premiere showperson round. Since there are only five species, only five individuals advance to the last round.

In the premiere showperson round, each exhibitor is required to showcase every species, regardless of whether they know the animal or not.

"You have to go show everything," junior Animal Science major Jessica Hoar said. "You have 10 minutes to learn how to handle each species you don't know how to handle already."

Winning in the finals round for the heifer division was junior Pre-Veterinary major Rebecca Bowen showing Taco Belle.

"It's very enjoyable and something everyone should do," Bowen said. "You have to work a lot with them [cows] and give them lots of loving and then they'll love you right back."

Placing first in the finals for the dairy goat division was sophomore Animal Science and Biology major Mandy Karnauskas. Participating in her first classic, Karnauskas has dedicated about an hour a day for the past two weeks in working with her dairy goat, Jenny.

"From what the judge told me, she [Jenny] was quick to respond to my commands and that's what set her above the rest of them," Karnauskas said. "It's a decent amount of work."

Other winners of the day include Sheep Champion: Tirtsa Porata-Doria; Horse Champion: Regina Payette; Beef Champion: Shannon McDarby; Swine Champion: Sam Kimball; Premiere Showperson: Sam Kimball; and Reserve Showperson: Shannon McDarby.

such as "Honk for Clean Air."

"[Protecting the environment] is no longer a nice thing to do, it's becoming an urgent matter of public health," said Committee member David Ahlfield. "Our focus is on the automobile, because it's a major user of fossil fuels and contributer to global warming."

The day began with the Alternative Transportation Parade on North Pleasant Street, where traffic was stopped for an hour as attendees danced and children rode their bicycles. A ribbon-cutting ceremony was held at Hallock Street, signifying the opening of a new bicycle route.

The participants eventually made their way to the Amherst Common, where the Earth Day Celebration began. As families, Five College students and activists danced to the music of local bands, organizations ranging from the Massachusetts Bicycle Coalition to Hare Krishna who distributed information and solicited members. Keeping with the theme of environmentalism, Clean Water Action, an environmental advocacy group, gathered signatures urging Governor Paul Cellucci to expand clean-air emissions standards.

Throughout the past week, the Earth Day Committee has been conducting events to encourage residents to adopt alternative methods of transportation, including a bicycle tour of Amherst and a lecture by environmental author Jane Holtz Kay.

Many participants also made suggestions as to how automobile use could be decreased year-round.

Committee member Hwei-Ling Greeney, citing statistics that show 90 percent of UMass commuter students driving to campus alone, declared the need for "reliable public transportation."

"The PVTA [Pioneer Valley Transit Authority] could make their service tailored to people's needs," she said. She suggested the PVTA increase the range of its routes, and run more frequently on weekends.

She explained, however, that the solution also requires the commitment of the public. "We all need to make a conscious effort," she said.

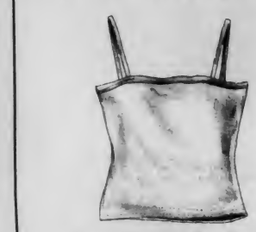
Attorney Jan Schlichtmann, portrayed by actor John Travolta in the film A Civil Action, will be speaking in the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 8:00 pm.



Schlichtmann, an alumnus of the University of Massachusetts Amherst, gained national notoriety when he represented eight Woburn, Massachusetts families against W.R. Grace and Beatrice Foods for the contamination of the Woburn City Water Supply. While the case was lost, it led to one of the largest environmental cleanups in New England's history. The case was the subject of a number of national radio and television shows and reports, including "60 Minutes."

A Civil Action a bestselling book, was written about the case, with Schlichtmann as the main character. In 1998, the book was made into a successful film, starring John Travolta and Robert Duvall.

After graduating from UMass, Schlichtmann attended Cornell Law School. He began a private practice in 1978, and served on the faculty of the New England School of Law. After the Woburn case brought him to national prominence, he served as a member of a legislatively mandated committee to author a revision of the Massachusetts Hazardous Waste Cleanup Statute.

He has also been a lecturer, speaking at various professional and civic groups. He has testified before a number of governmental agencies and legislative committees on issues of toxic waste liability and the civil justice system.

several hours after the NATO strikes — the second in three days against the station. But the image was often distorted and wavering because the network borrowed facilities from a private station with limited range.

Near the Albanian border with Kosovo, spokesmen for the rebel Kosovo Liberation Army appealed for NATO to supply them arms and deploy U.S. Army Apache helicopters against Serb forces immediately.

"The Serbian war machinery makes Kosovo one very big concentration camp," said Gani Syla, one spokesman for the rebel movement.

He accused Serb forces of at least three recent massacres, including one in the village of Izbica where 160 people allegedly were killed. The accounts could not be independently confirmed.

The latest outage of Serb TV was caused by a NATO strike on a key transmission facility about 10 miles south of Belgrade, cutting off a Russian romance movie on the air at the time. A link used by foreign TV crews to send footage out of Yugoslavia also was destroyed, but those news organizations were arranging transmissions through other means.

Serb TV was first knocked off the air early Friday after NATO missiles destroyed its headquarters in downtown Belgrade. At least 15 people were killed, according to local authorities. The station quickly resumed broadcasting.

Tanjug said NATO missiles hit the northeastern industrial area of Nis early yesterday, causing extensive damage. Five other missiles hit a chemical plant in Lucani, about 60 miles south of Belgrade, Serb media said. An air-raid siren sounded in Belgrade late yesterday night.

Sirens sounded over Serbia's second largest city, Novi Sad, even as Cornelio Sommaruga, head of the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross, toured wreckage from earlier NATO strikes on the city, which destroyed all three of the its bridges across the Danube River.

Other events included a slam dunk contest, three-point shootout and a basketball workshop by the UMass Minutewomen's basketball head coach Joanie O'Brien.

Other teams competing for their division included the Springfield Junior Slamm and the Holyoke Rams.

Junior Slamm member Kerry Shea from Long Meadow is excited to be playing streetball without any rules.

"We're just playing for fun," Shea said. "It's a good experience to play streetball without referees and a lot of rules."

Holyoke Rams player Ann Greaney said she learned a lot by playing against opponents she didn't know.

"You don't know how the players are going to be, or whether you're going to win or not," Greaney said. "It's cool. It gives you something to do on a weekend."

Other Holyoke Ram members Melissa Prattico, Caitlin O'Neill and Lauren O'Neill were hoping for a good standing in the tournament.

Jay Gladden, assistant professor of sport management and co-director of Haigis Hoopla, said an event like Haigis would not be possible without the students' efforts. In fact, as early as the fall semester, students were actively beginning to raise sponsorship for the April event through a sport event sponsorship class. The class teaches students how to attract sponsors as well as what it means in a management world.

When the weekend was over, the 25 students were in charge of loading the basketball hoops into the trucks. A semester's worth of work over in less than two days. Masteralexis, however, said the experience is worth it and something students will benefit from in the long run.

"Many of our alumni that have gone through the class have received jobs just based on putting on this Haigis Hoopla tournament," Masteralexis said. "It allows the community to see what great things the University students have to offer."

■ Extravaganja

KARA STORER/ COLLEGIAN

The eclectic crowd and funky music at Extravaganja created an appropriately surreal atmosphere.

"I didn't see anyone in the crowd put the handcuffs under the walkway [near the garden] but he [an undercover officer] was pretty [angry] saying it was stolen property to a college woman," the student said. "Someone had put the handcuffs underneath that white [walkway]. They chucked them underneath there and the undercover cop went underneath to get them."

Amherst police officer, John Chubzik, said a "young man" was arrested for possession of marijuana. The individual was being held until a parent or guardian picked him up Saturday. He said the individual would have a court date but he could not comment about the impact fleeing from the police would have on the case.

Resisting arrest does increase a misdemeanor to a felony.

Amherst police Seargent Mike Sullivan said there were six arrests from Extravaganja, five adults and one juvenile.

"I think they are being very provacative... trying to stir up the crowd by making high profile arrests. They say students are trouble-makers in this town but I think [Town Manager] Barry Del Castilho and [Amherst Selectmen] Hill Boss are the trouble makers in this town," said Terry Franklin a CRC spokesperson.

But most of the day's activities were centered on the stage where several speakers and bands entertained the crowd.

UMass Student Government Association President Jeff Howe, and Student Trusetee elect Seth Avakian, the first ever student represenatives to speak at Extravaganja, briefly addressed the crowd about students' rights in Residence Hall rooms.

"People like Hill Boss, people in the administration, those people don't want you to know [your rights] because then you're a problem," Howe said.

To make sure the crowd understood their point, Howe and Avakian handed out leaflets about unlawful search and seizure and gave the crowd a quick quiz.

"What do you do when a cop comes to your door without a [search] warrant? What do you do?" Avakian asked.

"Nothing," was the uniform response.

"Just say no to the bullshit and oppressive laws," Howe said. "Party on."

Most attending the event said they enjoyed it and came to hear the music, if not to support the political cause.

"I'm here to see Joint Custody and that's all. I don't even smoke pot," said Crissy Licciardello, a senior psychology major.

"It's like a characture," said Max Cover, a freshman physics and English major. "[It's like] little kids in elementary school doing things they shouldn't be doing."

"If you want to be taken seriously it has to be more serious. [There is] a lot of unfocused ambition," said Jon Austin, a junior anthropolgy major, of the political speeches and overall nature of the event.

"I wanted to come to see the people and the bands," said Stephanie Murphy a junior communications major. "It's a good time."

"I think it went very well," said Terry Franklin a CRC spokesperson. "[We are] determined to carry on. I think the town officials are still trying to intimidate us [but they are] not deterring us at all."

Hall burned...

On Wednesday, April 21, 1999, Webster Residence Hall burned to the ground.

That was a lie. For better or for worse, and regardless of odor, Webster is still up on Orchard Hill providing living space for countless honors students. The fact that Webster is still there is, however, in no way thanks to the Amherst Fire Department or the UMass police. Environmental Health and Safety did only slightly better.

Rob Schulze

I was just getting my friend Mitch so we could head down to the Wellness Center (whatever the hell that means) when the fire alarm went off. As is my penchant when fire alarms go off and I'm wearing nylon shorts and a George Carlin t-shirt, I said a very naughty word that rhymed with "runt" and went downstairs to the driveway. My friends from the floor formed a rough circle and began to talk about various issues vital to society ("What would you do if you were in the shower when the alarm went off?") while we waited for the fire truck to show up and investigate.

And wait we did. After about 10 minutes standing there on the pavement we began to notice that this was taking a fairly long time. A girl went to the call box and hit the emergency button. And still we waited. Roughly 15 minutes after the alarm first went off somebody finally showed up. A fire engine? Of course not. It was some U-Haul–looking thing with Environmental Health and Safety written on the side. A guy in a dress shirt and Dockers got out and proceeded into the building.

I wasn't sure exactly what this guy was supposed to be doing. I think we can safely assume that fires aren't environmentally healthy or safe without going in to take a look. Had there been an actual blazing fire, what did this guy plan to do? Blow on it? Shove his sock in the drain and turn on the faucet? Actually, since Dockers aren't exactly flame–retardant, what he probably would have done was die in a fire–soaked agony.

But at least he was there. He tried. After Dockers Man went in we continued waiting for real firemen (or firepersons, depending on how much of a jerk you are) to show up. Finally, at 4:17 by Matt O'Neill's ever–reliable watch, a fire engine and a UMass police cruiser pulled up to poor old Webster. The alarm originally went off at just before four o'clock. For all you math majors out there, that means that the response time of both the Amherst Fire Department and the UMPD was a lightning–quick 20 minutes.

It took a couple more minutes for an actual fireman with CHIEF written on his helmet to actually get off the truck and proceed to the building. He had a little trouble opening the door — I was afraid I'd have to lend him my UCard. He did get in, though, and poked around a little with Dockers Man (who'd rematerialized from nowhere) before letting us all in.

> "...the response time of both the Amherst Fire Department and the UMPD was a lightning–quick 20 minutes."

I consider this to be horrendous. This wasn't a fire drill, this was a bona–fide alarm. If there had been a fire, all us proud residents of Webster would have been simply screwed. You heard me: screwed. (Put that in your pipe and smoke it.) There's no possible way around that. My place of living, all my worldly possessions including my Hulk Hogan doll, my schoolwork; in fact, everything but my nylon shorts and George Carlin t–shirt could have been destroyed.

What possible reason could be given for this?

Lieutenant Dick of the UMPD and a firefighter known only as "Chief" apologized to the inhabitants of Webster Hall today: "The horse was sick so I had to drive, but I'm not s'good at the stick and Sarge would've killed me if I'd ground the gears, so I had to go slow," said a sheepish Lt. Dick, while the Chief merely growled and returned to playing the bagpipes.

These people are trained and paid solely to protect me and you from events like this. A prompt response can mean not only the saving of property but also the saving of lives. With the police right on campus and two fire stations close by there is no excuse that will explain this disgrace. No amount of apologies or excuses would have mattered had Webster actually burned to the ground without even an effort made to save it. Is that what It will take for an alarm to be taken seriously? Does someone have to die? Does the Hulkster have to melt?

Letters to the Editor

The consequences of drinking

To the editor:

My name is Michael Delaney of 12 South Prospect Street in Amherst. I am writing this letter to inform others of the dangers of excessive drinking. In April of 1998. I was involved in the brutal beating of Kyle Shonak and James D'Amour, both UMass students at the time. Both students were beaten severely. Although Kyle suffered more physical damage than James, both suffered from senseless violence. I would like to take this time to apologize to the Shonaks and the D'Amours. I am deeply sorry for putting them through this horrible experience.

As I mentioned above, this unnecessary ordeal was extremely trying on the two victims and their families. What I have yet to mention was the stress and disappointment which afflicted my parents as well. I not only let them down as their son but demonstrated a facet of my being which they have struggled so hard to protect me from. I am deeply sorry.

Excessive drinking can prohibit you from differentiating right from wrong. As seen in my case, I was unable to control my actions, thus resulting in reckless and damaging behavior. I can't say with good conscience that all the blame should be placed on my excessive drinking that night, but my sense of judgement was drastically altered. Again, I want to stress what kind of unjustified behavior can result from excessive drinking.

Believe me. I'm living proof

To the editor:

Throughout the years, probably no cliche has been more repeated and profound than "I was in the wrong place at the wrong time." I am a living example of this cliche. One night last April, I was involved in an alcohol–related incident in Amherst that will remain indelible for the rest of my life. Two friends and I participated in actions that resulted in injuries to another student. Although the outcome was neither planned nor predicted, the victim suffered physical and emotional wounds. Nothing positive has come from this experience except for the opportunity for me to speak to you.

Like most college students, I used to walk around with an inner feeling of invincibility. Teachers can educate us, parents can enlighten us. However, we often fool ourselves into making bad choices because we do feel invincible, especially when drinking alcohol.

The night the incident took place, I was under the influence of alcohol at a moderate level. We don't think a little alcohol can affect our judgement; however, it does. Regardless of the amount we consume, our train of thought begins to lack rationale, and emotion becomes the driving force behind our actions. If my friends and I were not drinking that night, many families' lives might not have been turned upside down.

Since the night of the incident, my life has changed dramatically. I often think of the victim and his family, whom I don't even know, and how they are doing today. I hope to one day personally apologize for my part in his undeserved attack. My parents, and those of my companions, have had to endure great expense and emotional distress. They sat in court and listened to the judge remand me to jail on Thanksgiving Eve.

I am now on probation for one year with many restrictions imposed upon me. And, for very misguided reasons beyond my control, I have lost one of my best friends due to the incident. This along with everything else has affected me deeply and will never be forgotten.

The impact alcohol has played in this terrible series of events should not be taken lightly... by me, or by any young person looking for an alcohol stimulated "good time." I am constantly reminded of how a split second of irrational behavior can change the lives of so many good people. Let my misfortune give you time to pause and think how you might approach drinking in the future. To sit here and tell anyone not to drink would be hypocritical and would reiterate a message that has shown few results. I just hope that when you do drink, you can try and do so responsibly and sensibly. Don't fool yourselves by thinking "this couldn't happen to me." It did. And, it does. I know.

Reviewing "Letter from Greece"

To the editor:

In response to Veronica MacDonald's column "Letter from Greece," I found the information given in the article presents a rather confusing and distorted view of the situation in Kosovo.

First, around 160,000 refugees have streamed into "Yugoslav" Macedonia (capital: Skopje). The Greeks' have a problem with the name "Macedonia," believing that it belittles the history of the Greek region of the same name. Her column suggested that refugees are actually entering Greek Macedonia or Albania, walking through these countries, and then entering Greece, as Kosovo shares no borders with Greece.

Additionally, it is important to recognize that although the U.S. is playing a dominant role in the region, the airstrikes are proceeding under NATO command. Greece, being a member of NATO, thus does play a role in the military strikes against Serbia.

Her article also makes a compelling argument for intervention in the region, noting that "genocide is a truly horrible thing," and she wonders why nobody feels sorry for the people of Kosovo. I feel that were the U.S. to take no action, even diplomatically, in the region, Ms. MacDonald's article would instead be decrying atrocities in the region and the U.S.'s unwillingness to stop them. Arguing against intervention despite genocide with the comment, "violence begets violence" implies that even during the Holocaust, the U.S. should not have intervened despite the mass killings of Jews, as getting involved would only have further provoked the Germans.

While airstrikes are arguably not the best solution to the problem, from a Greek perspective it is important to note that by stopping Serbian military actions now, NATO may prevent a spread of conflict which could incite conflict between Greece and Turkey.

I feel that the column ignored many of the major facts of the situation, arguing against involvement to aid the Kosovars, yet highlighting their desperate situation.

Perhaps the best recourse would be to write President Clinton a letter, suggesting that all future foreign policy decisions be based on the predictions of Nostradamus, as his premonitions seemed to be one of the major sources for the argument presented. Or, better yet, for a European perspective, read a few European newspapers.

Reasons to live

What the hell is going on here?

Everybody I know, myself included, is going through some sort of trauma. All my bills are going to be bigger and all my papers are going to be longer and all of them are going to be due on the same day.

I know that they are going to be due on the same day because of the simple rule that when life gets me down, it kicks me in the ribs until my kidneys don't function.

It's always at this time of year, too. Spring: what a crappy season. Yeah, birds are chirping, and violins are constantly playing and animals are off pairing up with one another's bones and whatnot, but my life always gets very stressful.

I'm not chirping, playing or jumping anyone's bones, so the nature of Spring does nothing for me.

Go figure.

Now, the reason I haven't made a quick fix of this whole problem long before now by, say, taking a long walk off a short cliff, is because there is really so much here to be happy about.

That's correct, there are reasons to live.

I certainly wouldn't call myself an optimist, though. I'm very logical with life — neither a grump nor a visionary of grandeur. The glass is neither half full or half empty to me. it's just there. I'll drink it if I'm thirsty, and break it if I'm angry. What do you think about that?

But I digress. Where was I? Oh, yes; having reasons to live. Chew on this...

Reason to live #1 — UMass police cruisers. With quite possibly the world's toughest looking vehicles, the University coppers have every right to ride around this campus on a major ego trip — whether they actually do or not is up the individual officer. If you've ever been to New York City, you've seen the NYPD cruisers, and, thus, unless you're colorblind or completely stupid, you know that these cars are baby blue.

Let me reiterate. "... these cars are baby blue."

How is anyone supposed to respect a police officer who pulls up in a baby blue cruiser? What are they going to do, club you over the noggin with a Barbie doll? Give me a break.

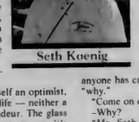
When the UMass cars show up, though, anyone has can be put to rest by the question "why."

"Come on over and party!"

–Why?

"Mr. Seth B. Koenig, we are unhappy to inform you that you still owe us $6,437,981, due on the exact same day as your next paper and exa s3?

"What word is three letters long, begins with a "w" and ends with an "hy"?"



–Why.

Reason to live #4 — Advertisements featuring Michael Jordan... oh. wait. That goes in the other list...

Reason to live #4 — This time for real. Sunglasses. You can look almost as cool as the UMass police in the right pair of sunglas s3 a UMass cop is wearing sunglasses while driving in one of those killer cruisers, though, you don't stand a chance. It doesn't really matter what time of day it is, you just have to wear them. Understand?

Reason to live #5 — Blade and The Matrix. The best two action flicks to grace the big screen since Hard Boiled and Bullet in the Head. Go rent and go see. Enjoy.

From Amherst to Philly: The journey to save Mumia

At about five in the morning, just hours away from sunrise, students from UMass and surrounding colleges gathered to begin their journey to Philadelphia. The six hour bus ride would begin in Amherst, but it would take them to a destination where they would join the struggle against political injustice and racism. Riding the bus was just half the voyage, once there, a whole new world would open up.

> "People of all ages and walks of life were gathered and unified to fight against political injustice and racism."
> Lanell James

The Millions For Mumia March was that destination. There the students would march through downtown Philadelphia and participate In an economic boycott that would exemplify their support of Mumia and the rest of the world's political prisoners. In the heart of Philadelphia these students would make a mark in time. With their just hours away from sunvoices, their bodies and their signs they would demand justice and a new trial for Mumia Abu–Jamal.

Once In Philadelphia, students walked from Veterans Stadium to the subway to catch a ride that would place them at the forefront of this revolutionary movement. The march began at City Hall where marchers rallied and listened to speeches concerning the importance of political activism. Leonard Weinglass, Mumia's lead counsel spoke out against the legal system, exposing the historical inconsistencies and racist practices of the cops, judges and other leaders in Philadelphia. Also present was Ozzie Davis, a political activist and actor. He is known for his role in "Get on the Bus," and he spoke out and instilled in the masses a sense of urgency.

During the speeches people danced, ate and sang songs. Mothers held their children, while adults, young and old, clutched banners supporting Mumia and condemning the legal system. People of all ages and walks of life were gathered and unified to fight against political injustice and racism. There were gays and lesbians, people with dreadlocks and spiked hair, followers of the Nation of Islam, anarchists, women activists, worker's unions, Africans, whites, Puerto Ricans, Black Panthers, college students, artists, socialists and concerned citizens. Unfortunately, the only "support" from the government came in the form of police barricades and circling helicopters.

After the speeches, people began to organize and prepare for the march that would wind through the streets of downtown Philadelphia. Seas of people were chanting, "No Justice, No Peace, No Racist Police," and "What do we want? Justice. When do we want it? Now!," and "Start a Revolution. Stop the Execution!" There were photographers hurriedly taking pictures and asking people for their feelings about the march. Even women and men shopping in local stores took time from their daily routine to poke their heads out into the streets to hear the crowd. At different points in time, the crowd became so energized that people started running while they were chanting.

By 4:30 p.m., the masses had made their way around downtown Philadelphia. Back at City Hall speeches continued while people rested on the steps. To all the students involved, The Millions For Mumia March was successful. They had marched and voiced their opinions about political injustice and the racist, unnecessary, use of the death penalty. On Saturday April 24, 1999, Mumia's birthday, this group of students stood up for justice and had fulfilled their duty to humanity by demanding a new trial for Mumia. The bus ride back was as long as it was getting there, but they had travelled and participated in a struggle for something important — political and racial justice.

The taboo of black power

What is black power, and why is it such a taboo?

This question is one that I have issues with. Many folks say that black people are equal to their white counterparts, but do they really believe that?

What is black power?

Black power is the people's ability to stand up for what they believe is right. It is the people's ability to stand up for what they want. It is the people's ability to possess patriotic thoughts and feelings about themselves.

Today, all this is being denied to our people by the powers that be, as well as by many of our peers.

A great European American legend Patrick Henry once said, "Give me liberty or give me death." No one has put it better than Mr. Henry himself (I will not go into the hypocritical aspects of his statement—that is not important at this moment).

Henry believed that if his people were going to be denied their liberty, he would rather be given death. This is not just another famous quote from the American history books—this is the soul of a people. And sure enough, when England did not give Patrick Henry and his people liberty, they took their rifles, and many put their life on the line so that those that come after will enjoy liberty.

In other words, they took it.

Today, the story of the bravery and courageousness of the American men who fought for their liberty are not described as guerilla warfare or riots—It is described as a war of belief, a war for freedom and a war where your personal life was insignificant and national liberty meant everything.

When the tables are turned though, it is a whole different school of thought. Black people in America are taught by not only the power structure, but also their parents, peers, mentors and sympathetic white allies that in the case of black freedom, non–violence is the way to go.

They tell you that violence never solves anything, they tell you that war is just going to get more people hurt, they tell you to be content because things are a lot better than they used to be and they show you the great example of how Ghandi freed his country through non–violence. You hear all this and you completely agree, you completely believe what these people tell you, and you completely lose your analytical skills.

But what aren't they telling you? Something is missing.

Are we truly equal?

> "America as it exists does not want its black and brown children. They have put us out in the barn yard with the rest of the farm animals."
> Edgar A. Barros

When Pearl Harbor was bombed, did the United States (white America) resort to non–violent tactics? I don't think so. Did they turn the other cheek? I don't think so. In fact, they dropped two atomic bombs on Japan — warning the rest of the world that the United States of America will not tolerate any violation of their civil right — human rights.

Black America on the other hand, does not believe in the same philosophy. Black America is stuck on this idea that somehow if I protest hard enough, he will give me my rights, he will allow me to walk through all the doors and he will bring me into his home and let me eat dinner at the same table.

NEWS FLASH — it is not going to happen.

They are not going to let us elect 250 black congressmen, they are not going to let us elect a black President, they are not going to appoint a black man in charge of the CIA or the FBI. They are not going to give us shit!

I'm sorry that this does not fit within your comfort zone, but we are a people in hibernation. We need to WAKE up.

We need to start looking beyond ourselves. We need to start looking at our children, our grandchildren and their children. An entire generation has to make a sacrifice. Non– violent protest can only get you but so much, especially when you are the only side being non–violent.

White people will never respect black people in America as their equals because whites fought and died for the freedom they have today. Freedom and patriotism carries a lot more weight when you know that your ancestors shed blood in order for you to be here today. It means a lot more when you know that your ancestors believed that you were worth dying for 200 years ago — before your were even a thought.

We as black people need to think of ourselves as such. We need to believe that we are the most important, the most deserving, the most beautiful and the most intelligent people on this earth.

Stop listening to the Uncle Tom's. Stop listening to the sympathetic whites. Stop listening to your confused brothers and sisters. Tell them not to have fear. Tell them that one day we are going to get tired of marching. Tell that one day we are going to get tired of swimming through the unjust justice systems fishing for handouts.

America as it exists does not want its black and brown children. They have put us out in the barn yard with the rest of the farm animals. They throw us leftovers for breakfast and leave us on our own to find dinner.

You don't believe me? Look around you and you too will see what I see. The administration here at the University has decided that race is no longer an important factor in our society. They either believe that racism is dead, or they just don't care. The Republican Club is another prime example. They don't like us. They don't want what is best for all people — they want what is best for their people. Can you blame them?

We need to start thinking about what is best for our people. Let us be real now, all the protesting and all the speeches in the world is not going to bring about the freedom of black and brown people in America.

A black revolution is coming. It almost happened in the 1960's.

Where Black Power Begins

It's a warm Saturday afternoon and I'm trooping through Northampton, trying to get a bite to eat on my lunch break. It's the same scene. Kids are hacking on the sidewalk. Would–be somebodies pass society's nobodies and don't look back. Children dart out of four feet ahead of their much slower parents, only to be scolded and told to slow down. I've seen it all before, but today I'm looking for something I haven't seen in a hot minute. And just like those old 3–D images you use to spend way too much time trying to see at the mall, the picture begins to come into view.

There are mad couples out these days.

> "All I'm trying to figure out is whether black love still reigns or if it has given way to a generation of physicality."
> Humphrey brown III

It seems like the promise of summer has brought the lovers out of the bedrooms and on to the streets. It's cool, though. I'm diggin' it, because I like to see people in love, doing their thing and holdin' it down. It genuinely puts a smile on my face. Call me soft, but it does.

So, as I'm peepin' this lovely scene, I start to notice something. I look to my left and it's the same story. I look to the right. no dice. I turn around, look back from where I just came from; foiled again. I do a complete 360 and realize that I'm not seeing what I hoped I would find.

There are no black couples in the Valley.

"That's ridiculous," you say.

"Hump, quite playin," you may insista but I tell you it's the truth.

If I'm wrong about my hypothesis, and no evidence has indicated that I am, where are all the black couples? Where are the wifes and boos and shorty–loves? What happened to takin' your man or woman to a semi–formal, showing up together and leaving together?

When did black people make the change from "Let's stay together" to "Keep it on the down low?"

Honestly, is it just me? Am I missing something?

I understand we're all in school and it's hard as hell to keep a relationship going in college (believe me, I understand) but it doesn't mean that we can't give each other love. I know it sounds like something a hippy would say on a bad acid trip, but it's real ya'll.

When did we get so ashamed to be monogamous?

I speak on this, not to dis' anyone on the promiscuous tip. That's not my intention. I have no problem with two adults consenting to engage in . . . well, anything they want. All I'm trying to figure out is whether black love still reigns or if it has given way to a generation of physicality.

I know I'm going to hear it from everyone on this piece, but it's just something that's been on my mind as of late. I mean, when I'm alone in my room and I stare at the wall. At the back of my mind, I hear . . . sorry, but you know what I'm getting at. It ain't got to be about getting married to the first person that just don't piss you off. It's about keeping a generation of black folks happy and loving each other. If you don't get what I'm sayin', ask yourself this. When was the last time you went out on a date?

Modern Beliefs of Jehovah's Witnesses

At the young age of 19 I began to think seriously about God, the purpose of life, the Earth and the future of mankind. I knew deep down inside that there is a loving God who cares about us, that is mankind. Living in Brooklyn, New York at the time really opened up my spiritual outlook. I perceived that there must be some unseen spirit behind the bad influences in New York City, and worldwide.

"What is the spirit that impels humans in a negative direction?" I often asked.

At one of Jehovah's Witnesses so kindly helped me to see, it is none other than Satan the Devil. He is a real spirit– person.

As 2 Corinthians 4:4 (New World Translation of The Holy Scriptures) states, "The god of this system of things has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, that the illumination of the glorious good news about the Christ, who is the image of God, might not shine through."

After grasping that text, I wanted to know more. I wondered since there are so many religions, how can one identify God's organization today?

By a diligent study of the Bible one can identify the true religion. The modern beliefs of Jehovah's Witnesses are all based on the Bible. As an organization/collective body we direct individuals to the Bible. Unlike cults, we do not force people to conform to our personal ideas and philosophies. We allow the individuals with whom we study with to make their own decisions based on their Bible trained conscience.

The Watchtower Bible and Tract Society (supported by the voluntary contributions of Jehovah's Witnesses) supplies Bible based publications to help individuals come to an accurate knowledge of the only true God, Jehovah.

Jehovah's Witnesses do not believe that baptism equals salvation. Although an important step in walking with God, we acknowledge the words that Jesus himself said at Matthew 24:13, "He that endures to the end is the one that will be saved."

So faith is required for salvation. Such faith will enable an individual to endure hardships In this old world that we are living in.

> "We demonstrate our love for our neighbors by willingly bringing to their doors a message of peace and everlasting hope."
> Michael Ambroise

In imitation of Christ, God's people are truly no part of this world (John 17:17). Therefore, we do not get involved in politics or engage in this world's military battles. Deaths caused by warfare have escalated to the hundreds of millions in this century alone. We bear witness to the divine name, Jehovah, and do the work that Jesus commanded–the preaching of the good news of God's Kingdom. This message, based on the Bible can reach anyone's heart. Even those who may have felt that they could never change their lives have responded to the influence of the Bible's message with time and effort. Such changes are not easy, and they do not occur overnight.

As a clean people, we abstain from fornication, the intake of blood and shun idolatry. We avoid revelries (wild parties), drunkenness and drug abuse. We recognize that such practices could severely harm us in the long run.

As Isaiah 48:18 states, "Jehovah is the one teaching us to benefit ourselves."

Be assured that the Bible can help you, no matter what your personal situation may be. The Bible is a book for all people.

As Acts 10:34,35 states, "God is not partial, but in every nation the man that fears him and works righteousness is acceptable to him."

Love is the bond that unites true worshipers today. Jesus said that love would identify his true followers. In modern times, Jehovah's Witnesses demonstrate love among themselves at Christian meetings, while Christian meetings. Jehovah's Witnesses also show love for one another by enjoying friendly gatherings and assisting one another when the need may be. We demonstrate our love for our neighbors by willingly bringing to their doors a message of peace and everlasting hope. The time of the end is near at hand. Our theme scriptural text for 1999 is taken from 2 Corinthians 6:2. It pronounces, "Look! Now is the day of salvation."

Fraternity demonstrates service

Gamma Phi Sigma–Latin Fraternity Delta Chapter "Heramanos Unidos," are making their mark here at the University of Massachussetts. The Delta Chapter represents community service and academics here at the University, and outside in the troubled, impoverished communites. Their Latin based organazation was started in 1992 at Temple University. The fraternity's Delta Chapter at the University of Massachussets at Amherst are followers of Jesse Jackson's famous qoute. "The only justification for ever looking down on somebody is to pick them up," said Jesse Jackson. From its debut at Temple University, their goals have been promoting higher education to students of African, Latin and European origin. The Fraternity completely understands their background: African, Spanish, and Native Americans. As their knowledge of history stands tall like many great scholars, their role of giving back does not stop with the books. A phenomanal aspect of the Delta Chapter is their dedication to educate and promote community service by working with women.

> "They passed a can around in all of their classes to collect donations; checks, coins and dollar bills from students, professers and anyone else that cares."
> Stanley Sterlin

"Women are still the heart and souls of this earth because of their endless dedication to children," said Brother Ricardo Rodriguez, a junior sociology major.

The Gamma's have made a vow to help women who are in need of protecting themselves from certain men — primarily rapists.

"Women are the leaders in the community, in other words, because our communities are so strong and vibrant, the brothers are making sure it stays that way," said Brother Omar Elmi, a senior psychology major.

A two–day workshop on ways to prevent Rape was recently held by the Gammas.

The two–day workshop was called "Rape Aggression Defense System."

Their dedication in helping women with unfortunate situations has not stopped them from reaching out to other areas where help is desparetely needed.

"It has come to the Delta's Chapter attention that at the University of Massachussetts, at least 900 single mothers are of need of financial support," Rodriguez said.

As the story anguishes the hearts of the fraternity, it has been said that a large portion of these single mothers have not been eating accordingly, because in the eyes of a loving mother, their splitting image will always come first.

But moreover, without consistent financial support from extended groups, single mothers are forced to work longer hours at their jobs, while their academics and time with their child diminish.

These are just a few issues which are hurting these single mothers from living a more comfortable life. But with help from other support groups, these brothers of the Delta Chapter: Isasia Rodriguez, Jose Escribano, Ozzy Ramos, Kenny Nesdo, Nestor Ramos, Kenny Valasquez, Jamie H. Flores, Cesar Medina, Omar Elmi, have started a money can drive to help relieve the tension, and bring back some relaxation to the single mothers' mind and body.

They passed a can around in all of their classes to collect donations; checks, coins and dollar bills from students, professers and anyone else that cares. The donation drive ran for seven days. Valuable funds were raised to help the single mothers on campus.

Liz lights up Mt. Holyoke's Chapin Friday night

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

LIZ PHAIR
Chapin Auditorium
April 23

Let there be light, said Liz Phair. And there was light. And it was good.

OK, so it wasn't that dramatic. But Phair, at one point in her show at Mt. Holyoke's Chapin Auditorium Friday night, did ask for the house lights to be turned on so the audience could decide which song she would play next, "Dance of the Seven Veils," or "Go On Ahead."

The crowd chose "Go On Ahead." And she played it. And it was good.

While the show wasn't as cathartic, or even as long, as her fantastic show last fall at the Avalon in Boston, she treated the crowd to a selection of a total of 17 songs from her three albums, in addition to two new songs: "Firewalker" and "Don't Apologize."

She opened the night by playing "Chopsticks," a song about an uncomfortable, fruitless one-night stand set to a simple piano figure, then the popular "Fuck and Run," off of her heralded debut Exile in Guyville. Looking alarmingly like Meg Ryan, Phair played the innocent bad girl throughout the night, throwing shy smiles and downcast eyes at the audience even as she enunciated every "ck" in every f– bomb she dropped.

Surprisingly, her setlist leaned on Guyville, her oldest album. In addition to the fantastic "Fuck and Run," she played the dark adult lullaby of "Flower" and "Stratford-upon-Guy." Whip-smart received a bit of a brush-off, with only "Chopsticks," "Cinco de Mayo" and "Supernova."

The crowd revelled in the songs, calling out requests that, for the most part, went unanswered. But, hands above heads, shouting for Phair to continue, they swam in the sexual explicitness of songs like "Soap Star Joe" and "Flower" that peppered the setlist.

But if you have nothing to back up the sexuality you might as well go home. If you can't kick out the jams, then there's no substance behind the controversy. Fortunately, Phair and her five-piece band provided some fireworks, like "Supernova" and "Divorce Song," and some startlingly beautiful moments, like the aching, almost-solo "Perfect World."

Stage patter was kept to a minimum, but Phair did have time to tell a story about getting high in the woods and meeting a baseball playing ghost.

Opener David Mead played a good, if not spectacular, set. His songs were polished and, especially in the case of his last song, did kick out the jams. The most the set did was lead me to wonder how a solo artist can convince their band to wear suits on a hot stage. The band came very close to being upstaged by their suits.

fanned five in going the distance for the third time this season. Cooke has also won five consecutive decisions after starting off the season 0–2, and sports a 4–0 mark inside the conference with a 1.61 earned run average.

The Minutemen gave Cooke all the support he would need thanks to a five-run second inning. Senior Brian Samela had the big hit in the frame with a two–run single, while Nick Gorneault added his first home run of the season. The other two runs in the inning came courtesy of an RBI groundout by Mike Kulak, and an RBI single by Shaun Skeffington.

UMass would then tack on another run in the third inning on another RBI single by Skeffington, who added a triple later to finish game one with a 3–for–5 performance.

Senior Aaron Braunstein then went on to continue his power surge in the sixth inning with a two–run homer. Braunstein now has nine longballs this season.

Game two was a pitchers' duel between UMass' Travis Veracka and Fordham's Colin Young. The game was scoreless heading into the top of the seventh inning before Samela drove home Kulak with an RBI single.

Veracka carried a no–hitter into the bottom of the seventh for the Minutemen before Young singled to lead off the inning. Fordham would touch Veracka for one more hit, but the Maroon and White were able to hold on for the one–run victory.

The junior southpaw pushed his record to 4–2 with the victory. He struck out eight in pitching his fourth complete game of the season.

UMass was held to only three hits in the second game, with Samela, Gorneault and Chris Morgan being the only Minutemen to reach base courtesy of a hit.

Both teams rounded out the series yesterday afternoon in the Bronx with UMass completing the sweep over the Rams. The Minutemen got gutty efforts from pitchers David Loonie and Craig Szado, who teamed up to limit Fordham to only two runs and six hits. The victory was Loonie's fourth of the season against only one defeat.

UMass got a single run in the top of the first before striking for three more scores in the second frame. The Maroon and White would tack on two more in the fifth and one in the sixth before Fordham chased Loonie from the game in bottom of the inning after surrendering two runs.

The Minutemen then went on to score two more times in the eighth for the final seven run margin of victory.

Bryan Mazzaferro led the way for UMass with a 4–for–5 day at the plate. He also knocked in a pair of runs. Samela and Gavin Clark each had two hits, while Skeffington doubled, stole a base and scored three runs from the leadoff spot.

The Minutemen will now set their sights on claiming another Beanpot Tournament title this week. UMass will play Northeastern on Tuesday afternoon at 2 p.m. at Fenway Park in Boston. Depending on the outcome, the Minutemen will then either play in the championship or consolation game on Thursday.

Gwen Rack, giving UMass the lead for good, 6–4.

Between both contests, Rooney produced four hits, three of which came during the memorable game two. She also stole a base in the opening game. Shortstop Kiley Scofield, who recently recovered from a shot to the head, matched the total offensive production of Rooney with four hits of her own. The pair of victories improved UMass to 34–8 overall, and 11–1 in the Atlantic 10. URI dropped to 18–27–1 overall, and 6–8 in the A–10.

In game one, Minutewoman pitching ace Danielle Henderson dominated the Rams batting order. The UMass strikeout queen fanned 14 hitters, yielding only a single hit to No. 5 Rhode Island batter Beth Benoit. Having already earned a win for the first game, Henderson appeared as a relief pitcher in game two. She replaced starter Carrie Jeffries (who yielded four earned runs) in the fourth inning and held the Rams hitless over the final four frames. As a result of the UMass seventh–inning comeback, Henderson captured her second win of the day, improving her 1999 mark to 22–2. She also collected a total of 23 strikeouts between both appearances.

Although not as glorious as their rally of game two, the Minutewomen notched a close victory in game one. After two scoreless innings, UMass plated its first run in the third when freshman power–hitter Cherra Wheeler (two–for–four in game one) drove in pinch runner Ashley Bakken. The second of three Minutewoman runs was scored in the fifth inning on another Wheeler RBI. The Kingsburg, Calif. product brought home Galas with a double off Ram pitcher Stephanie Poetzsch, who fell to 8–13 with the loss. Third baseman Annie Smith scored the final run in the sixth inning on a Scofield triple.

Riding a 14–game winning streak, UMass returns home to Totman Field for Thursday's 3:30 p.m. double–header against Rutgers. The Minutewomen had played their previous six contests on the road against three separate conference foes. They also traveled to Dayton on April 17 before the double–header was rained out.

her performance.

Anderson was also solid, scoring two goals to improve her total to 22 goals. Ingraffea is quietly having a great year as her two goals brought her total to 14 goals heading into the last game of the season.

The biggest news of the day for UMass was that they finally came out on top in a close game, and the confidence acquired in that fact is worth more than the win itself.

"For us, this is the first tight game we pulled out at the end, and it's great in terms of confidence," Anderson said.

The Minutewomen ended their regular season yesterday with a win over Duquesne on senior day, 9–5. They will next take on Virginia Tech again next weekend in the semifinals of the A–10 tournament on Saturday.

"Virginia Tech was expected to be a tough game, but we had a five to 10 minute span where we kind of broke down allowing them to get close to us. Now we know that at A–10's we are going to play against Virginia Tech again and we can't let the span happen again," Pavlick said.

UM women's lax sweeps A-10 pair

Victory over Duquesne Dukes sends off seniors in style

DAN SANTELLA / COLLEGIAN

Laura Korutz and the UMass women's lacrosse team swept a pair of A-10 foes this weekend downing Duquense and Virginia Tech at Totman field.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The historical first season of competition in the newly organized Atlantic 10 conference, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had one goal for the regular season: get in the conference tournament.

Once the Minutewomen had tip-toed by A-10 foe Virginia Tech 8–7 on Friday — after outright massacres of other conference–mates La Salle (17–3) and St. Joseph's (14–9) were already in the books — the goal had been reached.

Still, there was the matter of Sunday's matchup with Duquesne at Totman Field. With a 3–1 A–10 record, their appearance in next weekend's inaugural tournament was not up for debate.

On the line yesterday for UMass (9–5 overall) was momentum... and a big message to the field of four that will be fighting it out for the tourney title in Philadelphia. With the 9–5 victory, that message was clear.

"It was a big game because the Atlantic 10's are this weekend and it really confirmed where our standings are for this weekend and it really confirmed that we can beat anyone in the A–10," sophomore defender Kara DePaula said. "It was really important for us to beat the last team in the A–10 before we go into the post–season."

Not lost in the intensity of securing clout heading into the tournament was the play of Melissa Anderson and Laura Korutz, the two senior co–captains who were playing their last home game donning the maroon and white of Massachusetts. The fact that the contest was such a milestone for arguably two of the best players in the program's history made for a somewhat distracted opening few minutes of play.

"It was very exciting," Anderson said. "I was a little shaken up at first, because I was kind of sad — emotions were going through, but everyone played awesome. Everyone picked themselves up. It was a great game, and it was a lot of fun. It was the most fun I've had all year."

The opposing Dukes (11–5, 2–3 A–10) capitalized on the Minutewomen's reflections and left UMass playing catch–up for most of the first period of play. Duquesne midfielder Meghan Hungate started the afternoon's scoring with a free position goal at the 24:30 mark, and less than a minute later saw their second notched on the scoreboard in immediate retaliation to Noelle Gorski's Massachusetts tying shot.

Slightly more than eight minutes ticked away before the slow–starting Minutewomen could even up the game at two. Korutz drew in two Duke defenders while darting to the goal before tossing a pass over to DePaula on her left, who was noticed too late sneaking into the picture. DePaula, who had three total points on the day, one–timed it by Duquesne goalie Becky Stauffer for the goal.

"I think that we looked tired and played tired," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "There were some tough mental mistakes, which is too bad, but I think the kids have gotten stronger and stronger about picking up the pace."

After freshman attack Katie Harmer reclaimed the advantage for the Dukes with a coast–to–coast goal, eluding Gorski to beat Minutewomen net–minder Jen Nardi with 10:04 left in the first half, Massachusetts finally began to dig in.

Over the final 40 minutes of the game, Duquesne could manage only two points.

"We came out slow to begin with," UMass defender Lynne Young said. "Our defense really stuck with it. We had Nardi really anchoring us down low. She made some saves that really pumped the defense up and we just went out there and played an awesome team game."

The Minutewomen were far from finished, however, as Anderson and Korutz highlighted a dominant Massachusetts showing that included seven more strikes — two by sophomore attack Rachel Ingraffea with assists by junior middie Stephanie Pavlick.

UMass women's lax knocks off Virginia Tech in the first game on senior weekend

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team held on for a huge win on Friday afternoon when they downed the Virginia Tech Hokies, 8–7 at Ruth L.Totman field.

Coming into this weekend's contests the Minutewomen (8– 5, 3–1 in the A–10) needed to come up with two solid performances against Duquense and Virginia Tech (7–6, 2–2 in the Atlantic 10).

The Minutewomen used a goal by junior midfielder Stephanie Pavlick to give UMass an 8–5 lead with 7:18 to go in the second half. The UMass defense would do the rest holding on to get the one point win despite goals by Karen Diacont and Dawn Will, who between them scored five of the Hokies seven goals.

The major influence in those last eight minutes for the Minutewomen was the play of sophomore,netminder Jen Nardi who made 15 saves in route to earning her fifth victory of the season.

"Actually it wasn't one of my better performances, but when it counted I was there, but the D in front of me was solid," Nardi said.

"She has had some great moments especially since the UConn game — she's been really steady. You're going to let some goals in our sport, but she made some saves on 8– meter shots that was really nice. She has just been playing rock solid," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said of Nardi's recent play.

Nardi especially came through during the middle of the second half and down the stretch, when the Hokies maintained a steady pressure in the zone and were able to earn a number of free positions, but couldn't beat Nardi.

"I play my best when I play under pressure. I'm not really worried about it because I know that everyone is going to do their job in front of me," Nardi said of the pressure in the late stages of the game.

UMass and Virginia Tech exchanged goals in the first part of the game, while it poured down. The Minutewomen fell behind to the Hokies 3–1, and it would stay that way until there was 5:33 remaining in the first half, when Melissa Anderson scored her second and UMass' second goal of the game starting a barrage of UMass scoring.

Only 1:13 later, Rachel Ingraffea would score a goal to tie it on a fabulous pass from Pavlick. Ingraffea one timed the pass past Hokies goalie Melissa Wagner, who made 17 saves in the losing effort. Forty seconds after Ingraffea's goal, Minaker completed the barrage, when she scored her 10th goal of the season, after taking a pass from senior Laura Korutz, and beat Wagner low to the short side.

The Minutewomen gave up a goal late in the first to go in at the half with the score tied at four, but would come out in the second half still fired up and tallied the first three goals of the half on scores from Ingraffea, Sara MacNabb and Noelle Gorski.

Pavlick had a solid game for the Minutewomen scoring the game–winning–goal and collecting two assists.

"I felt that against Temple I couldn't come through so I felt the best way I could help my teammates was through assists. Personally I think assists are better then goals, and I just tried to find the open players and contribute," Pavlick said of

Lacrosse loss to Irish tough to swallow

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Danielle Henderson threw a shutout in game one and pitched four innings of scoreless relief in the second game in a two game sweep of URI this weekend.

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

There was little consolation for Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella Saturday afternoon. He shook his head as he looked over the statistics from that day's 9–7 loss to Notre Dame at Richard F. Garber Field.

But he knew the answers, the reasons why his team had lost would not be on the paper.

"I thought we weren't ready mentally. I thought we did a poor job preparing ourselves for this game," Cannella said. "I was very disappointed in our mental effort. I told the guys that I was very disappointed in them, and they should be very disappointed in themselves."

The hardest part however, is not knowing why those mental lapses exist.

"I have no idea why. I don't know. I have no idea. I have no answers," he said, sighing. "It is the most frustrating thing I have ever dealt with in my life."

The Fightin' Irish (7–5) may not have known why those problems plagued the Minutemen (4–7), but they surged in the second quarter to jump on their hosts. In what would become a familiar refrain for the Garber Field faithful, it was senior Chris Dusseau and sophomore Tom Glatzel who led the Irish scoring charge.

They pair combined for their first with 5:17 remaining in the first half and UMass clinging to a 1–0 lead courtesy a Jeremy Guski blast. Just over a minute into the second period, Glatzel found Dusseau just off the left post and the senior connected to give Notre Dame its first lead.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

John Madigan

"Tommy's got great eyes," Dusseau said. "He's really unselfish, so a lot of times I would swing through off a slide and he'd be able to look right through the defense and find me."

Halfway through the same quarter, Dusseau took Glatzel's feed on a right–to–left cut before he jumped and fired past UMass goalie Chris Campolettano. Dusseau, who came into the game off a five–goal tear against Army, closed the first– half scoring with a shot over Minuteman defender John Hutchen and by Campolettano at his shins.

"He's a great off–ball player. He was able to get open a lot. Whenever I turned my head it seemed like he was able to slide and find the open slot," Hutchen said. "And he's a good shooter, he's able to put the ball away."

After a sluggish start to the open the second half, the Minutemen were able to find some remnants of their scoring touch. Sophomore John Madigan fired from close range after Rich Kunkel passed the ball in from the point, cutting the deficit in half, 4–2, with 8:06 left in the third.

But three Notre Dame goals in a row — including a fifth on the day from Dusseau — cut deep into UMass' already painful wound.

Madigan did what he could to stop the bleeding, picking up his second and third scores of the day off Keith Gabrielli assists to make the score 7–4 at the end of the third.

"It's good to have a good individual game, but if the team doesn't win it takes all the fun out of it. It just washes it all away," Madigan said. "In the first half we couldn't clear the ball, we couldn't even pass and catch. We scored first in the second half, but we let up again. You can't let up on a team like that."

Although two goals from Kunkel and another from Madigan helped pull the Minutemen closer to the Irish, but two more Irish tallies sealed UMass' fate.

Cannella now faces the unenviable task of preparing his team for Syracuse. The task of putting this game behind the Minutemen and focusing them on the No. 4 team in the country. But he feels the motivation will be there.

"This one is going to last for a little bit, just because it's so difficult to swallow," he said.

Softball team comes from behind; beats RI

By Aaron Saykin

If Yogi Berra had watched them this weekend, he would certainly have been impressed.

Trailing by a run before their final at bat, the members of the Massachusetts softball team rallied behind Berra's "It's not over until it's over" platform, and escaped Rhode Island with a 6–4, come–from–behind victory on Saturday afternoon.

The win was the second of the day for the Minutewomen, who had earlier captured the first game of the double–header against the Rams 3–0.

The comeback in game two began in the fifth inning for the Minutewomen, who had trailed 4–2 at the time. Freshman center fielder Teri Rooney collected the first of her two clutch hits for UMass. The Visalia, Calif. native singled into left field scoring lead–off batter Mandy Galas and cutting the deficit to one run, 4–3. By the time Rooney had reached the plate in the her team's final at–bat, the game had been tied at 4–4 — the result of two costly Rhode Island errors. With two runners on base, Rooney belted a base– clearing double off Ram pitcher

Thanks to a solid weekend against Fordham University in which the Massachusetts baseball team swept a three–game set from the Rams, the Minutemen appear to now be a lock for another Atlantic 10 Eastern Division title.

UMass (21–12, 10–2 in Atlantic 10) won both games of a doubleheader on Saturday by scores of 8–0 and 1–0, before closing out the weekend on Sunday with a 9–2 victory over Fordham.

Senior co–captain Bill Cooke got things started off on the right foot in the first game of Saturday's doubleheader by tossing a three–hit shutout against the Rams. In the process, the lefthander tied Jason Bennett for the UMass career mark for victories with 25.

The win was Cooke's 14th straight Atlantic 10 victory dating back to the 1997 season. The New Jersey native

Lawyer behind A Civil Action speaks at UM

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Renowned civil lawyer Jan Schlichtman spoke in the Student Union Ballroom yesterday evening.

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Few would expect a lawyer to attack the concept of litigation, yet the hundreds of students who crowded into the Student Union Ballroom last night to attend a lecture by famed attorney Jan Schlichtmann saw just that.

Schlichtmann, a University of Massachusetts graduate, also works as an environmental activist and educator. He achieved national prominence when he brought a ground– breaking lawsuit against two corporations for polluting the city water supply of Woburn, Massachusetts. The case was the subject of the book A Civil Action, which was recently adapted into an acclaimed motion picture.

"I know the reason you want me here," said Schlichtmann, beginning his speech. "You want to know what it was like to have John Travolta play me."

Schlichtmann hardly mentioned the film in his lecture, however. He concentrated on the futility of embittered civil lawsuits, and the need for cooperative conflict resolution.

"We have never, in the history of humankind, solved a conflict through conflict," Schlichtmann said. "Not in the history of litigation has a problem been resolved in a courtroom. And they never will... it can only create more conflict."

He suggested that all sides of environmental disputes work towards a mutual settlement, insisting that it is often in the best interests of corporations to pay settlements to plaintiffs.

"Could [accused corporate polluter] Beatrice Foods walk out of town, and not expect their problems to follow them?" he asked.

Schlichtmann also spoke about the importance of environmentalism, and maintaining a connection with the earth. At one point, he described a tree near his house which he referred to as his "therapist."

"The tree saved my life," he said. "Every time I have a problem, [the tree and I] talk about it."

He said that by taking on the Woburn case, he went on a journey in which he learned about the importance of nature. He claimed that it was natural beauty that attracted Anne Anderson, one of the plaintiffs in the case, to the Woburn area.

"Just a little after Earth Day and the founding of the EPA (Environmental Protection Agency), Anne learned that her son had leukemia," said Schlichtmann.–

When Anderson learned that numerous other children in the community had contracted the same illness, the families hired Schlichtmann to sue two companies that they suspected had contaminated the local water supply.

Schlichtmann, who was at first reluctant to take the case, became a vigorous defender of the families, going into debt to pursue the case even after it was thrown out of court.

With Schlichtmann's prodding, the EPA eventually demanded that the two companies engage in a massive clean–up of the Woburn area.

A Civil Action chronicled the events of the Woburn case, presenting Schlichtmann as the central character. While Schlichtmann praised the book as "fabulous," he expressed disappointment with the film version.

"I think the movie drained a lot of the [story's] humanity," he said. He said that the movie took "a lot" of liberties with the facts of the case, and suggested that it strayed too far from the book.

While many of the audience members were skeptical of Schlichtmann's ideas on litigation, most praised his idealism.

"I was very struck by what he said about the legal system — how conflict can not resolve conflict," said Marta Peimer, a senior psychology major. "Usually you see lawyers making tons of cash, and they never acknowledge flaws in their system."

"I thought he had a very interesting style," said Lori Thayer, a graduate student in anthropology. "–It was almost Dr. Seuss–like."

Walk hopes to increase safety, decrease crime across campus

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

In re–assessing the safety of the University of Massachusetts campus, the third annual Safety Walk will be offered tonight at 7:30 p.m. starting on the Student Union steps.

The walk is being sponsored by Jody Bailey, associate speaker of the undergraduate Student Senate and UMass Police Chief John Luippold.

The walk was started three years ago by UMass student Stacey Shackford, who was then a member of the Women's Issues Committee. The committee raised questions of safety on campus and decided to host a walk to address the issue.

"They [committee] issued a report that had repairs that needed to be done, what paths were unsafe and what call boxes were out in regards to what paths," Bailey said.

Bailey says the report went to the Dean of Students Joanne Vanin and Tom Robinson, then–vice chancellor of Student Affairs, immediately issued 15 new call boxes to be installed around campus.

Every year since then, Chief John Luippold and members of the vice chancellor's Summit on Safety committee — which includes the representatives from the Dean of Students office, Parking Services, Student Security, Auxiliary Services and Physical Plant — have participated in the walk, joined by other interested students, the group visits various sites on campus to evaluate them based on lighting, availability of call–boxes and appearance.

"Basically, we wanted all these people to be involved and especially the [department] heads because we wanted to make sure we wouldn't have to go through a lot of red tape to get things done," Bailey said.

Students' safety concerns are passed on to the vice chancellor of student affairs for consideration. Action is taken in most cases, Bailey says, and the most immediate concerns involving student safety are tended to first.

"The very next day, things started getting done," Bailey said. "New light bulbs were installed in crosswalks and plans to implement call boxes were made."

In some cases, Bailey feels the call boxes aren't installed immediately because of electrical wiring problems to certain areas and the high cost to install them. However, Bailey says Dean of Students office and the Summit on Safety committee work on them promptly.

"I know they're in the process of installing them," Bailey said. "If there are problems at night, we wanted to make sure they were fixed immediately so students would feel safer walking across campus."

Bailey is hoping to hold the walk every semester to examine any new changes or concerns that may arise regarding campus safety.

Bailey says getting student feedback on their safety concerns and watching it get put to action brings her a sense of fulfillment.

"This is one of the more gratifying things to do through student government because it directly affects every student that walks on campus," Bailey said. "If people are scared for their safety walking across campus at night, this walk would be for them."

Attempted theft gives rise to deeper concerns

Five University of Massachusetts student were arrested early yesterday morning at Pierpont Residence Hall after attempting to steal a pool table, Amherst police said.

Gerald M. Auger of Taunton, Christopher P. Bullman of Greenfield, Peter G. Preston of Clinton, N.I., Ayora N. Govignon–Berry of Amherst and Beau C. Marchitelli of Amesbury, all 19, were arres–ted at 1:18 a.m. and charged with breaking and entering at night for felony and larceny over $250.

All pled not guilty yesterday morning at Hampshire County District Court in Northampton. They will reappear in court on June 17 for a pre–trial hearing.

During their arraignment, the five students stood together as their cases were read, all with similar close–cropped hairstyles. According to Director of Greek Affairs Michael Wiseman, the hairstyle may be the mark of a fraternity to which police said the five were probably pledging — Phi Mu Delta. The president of the fraternity could not be reached for comment.

The incident has raised questions about hazing at the University. When most people think of hazing, they think of forced drinking or situations in which their lives are clearly in danger. But, Wiseman said, hazing can take other forms.

According to one fraternity pledge book, hazing can include anything from preventing a pledge from attending class to forcing a pledge to dress in a certain manner.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

A recent incident involving men police believed to be Phi Mu Delta fraternity pledges raises questions about hazing at the University.

The UMass Student Code of Conduct defines hazing as: "any conduct or method of initiation into any student organization... which willfully or recklessly endangers the physical or mental health of any student or other person, such as extended deprivation of sleep or rest, forced consumption of food, liquor, beverage, or drugs, beating or branding."

If the recent arrests are linked to fraternity initiation, the incident could be considered hazing by the University,

Town Meeting agenda set

Select Board makes decisions about what items will, won't be discussed

By Jill Carroll

AMHERST — Final preparations for Town Meeting, which starts tomorrow, were made last night during the Amherst Select Board meeting.

The five–member Board finished up taking stands on several articles that the several weeks long Town Meeting will vote on, and assigned which Board member would bring which article to the legislative Meeting's floor.

The role of the University of Massachusetts and the ever–approaching Y2K computer glitch problem was addressed as part of the preperations last night.

Two articles concerning Y2K will be brought before Town Meeting. One is to request funding for the Emergency Management plan, to update it and pay for Y2K preparations, including a generator in case power goes out Jan. 1, 2000.

There has been considerable debate over whether buying a generator would be a good safeguard in an emergency or a waste of money. A second article is going before Town Meeting requesting a generator not be paid for.

Both these articles should be postponed until a later day of Town Meeting, Town Manager Barry Del Castilho said last night, until after a report on electricty readiness is released Friday and there is more discussion with the University about using it as a shelter.

Del Castilho said he had received indications last week that the University is willing "to work with us to designate a space on campus that would be appropriate as an emergency shelter... but the details remain to be worked out," he wrote in his report concering the two articles.

Help from UMass, plus a positive report from the National Electricity Reliability Council, which deals with electrical readiness for Y2K, could make the generator issue moot.

Turning to locomotion, the Board voted to recommend an article proposing the town pay for half of a trial period for a new route for Pioneer Valley Transportation Authority (PVTA) buses. The trial period will be six months, half payed by the town and the other half funded by PVTA.

The new route would run from the Red Cross allowed to see captive U.S. soldiers; release is not likely

By George John
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Nearly a month after Yugoslav forces captured three U.S. soldiers along a disputed border, the Red Cross was finally allowed to see the men but chances of their release anytime soon were considered slim.

Western officials cited critical comments by a Yugoslav leader, meanwhile, as evidence of the first crack in President Slobodan Milosevic's regime since the NATO air campaign in Kosovo began March 24.

The U.N. relief agency said it had credible evidence Serb forces were using Kosovo refugees as human shields to help protect them from NATO airstrikes. And NATO said its anti–tank Apache helicopter force was ready to begin operations from neighboring Albania. The European Union tightened economic sanctions and banned fuel shipments to Yugoslavia but left the touchy issue of enforcing it with an Adriatic naval blockade to be worked out by the NATO alliance.

International Committee of the Red Cross chief Cornelio Sommaruga gave no information about the soldiers' condition but said a Red Cross doctor and a delegate would pay another visit to the three today. After meeting Milosevic, though, he expressed pessimism they would be freed before the war ends.

"International humanitarian law says prisoners of war would be liberated at the end of active hostilities. Regrettably, we are not at this point at the moment," Sommaruga said.

The U.S. soldiers were shown on Serb TV after their March 31 capture near the Macedonia border with bruised faces and cuts. The Red Cross had repeatedly been denied access to the soldiers, who are believed held in or near Belgrade.

"I was able to talk to them only a few minutes," Sommaruga said at a news conference. "We looked into each other's eyes and shook hands very warmly."

Sommaruga said "it was not possible to have a full–fledged ICRC visit in accord with the provisions of the Geneva Convention" but that he had given the men letters from their families and paper to write back.

White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said yesterday's meeting came "25 days late" and represented a "bare minimum" of what international law requires in terms of access to war captives. He said the three "appear to be in good condition."

Held captive are Staff Sgt. Andrew A. Ramirez, 24, of Los Angeles; Spc. Steven M. Gonzales, 21, of Huntsville, Texas; and Staff Sgt. Christopher J. Stone, 25, of Smiths Creek, Mich. When told the Red Cross had seen his son, Stone's father, Jim C. Stone of Avoca, Mich., said "Yippee! That's absolutely wonderful news."

Stone's mother–in–law, Lisa McKinney of San Antonio, Texas, said: "At least we know he's alive."

Sommaruga also said the ICRC would work to reopen its mission in Kosovo after receiving security assurances from Milosevic. Yesterday afternoon, air raid alerts sounded in Novi Sad and Nis, Yugoslavia's second– and third–largest cities, signaling NATO attacks. After sunset, air raid sirens sounded in the central industrial town of Cacak.

NATO missiles blasted an already damaged bridge over the Danube River earlier in the day, sending the last of three rail and road crossings in Novi Sad crashing into the water.

NATO said it was destroying the bridges in the northern city to prevent troop deployments south to Kosovo.

Wiseman said. The connection could be hard to prove, however.

"It depends on what their motivation was," said Cliff Hirtle, vice president of Pi Lambda Phi, and whether or not they were doing something they were required to do or if they did it of their own will.

Although Hirtle was careful not to associate the incident with hazing, he admitted that hazing does take place in the UMass Greek system.

"I know and I've heard from other people... it definitely does happen," Hirtle said. "No fraternity starts up with the intention of hazing. But over the course of time, [certain things] become tradition. It evolves and becomes standard, and people keep the tradition."

"It's like playing a game of Asshole," explained fellow Pi Lambda Phi member Tom Butler. "You like to be the President and tell everyone to drink."

According to Hirtle, Pi Lambda Phi does not haze its pledges — in fact, non-hazing was one of its founding principles. And other fraternities and sororities are coming up with other ways to combat hazing.

Butler, Hirtle and Wiseman differed in opinion about what should be done to address the problem — whether internal regulation, inter-fraternity education or University programs.

But all agree something should be done. "It's sad that it takes a situation [such as the one] at MIT to wake people up," Hirtle said.

Colorado shooters wanted to kill 500

LITTLETON, Colo. (AP) — The two students who carried out the attack at Columbine High dreamed of an even bigger bloodbath, plotting to kill hundreds of neighbors, then hijack a plane and crash it into New York City, investigators said yesterday.

Authorities also questioned an 18-year-old girlfriend of Eric Harris about whether she bought two of the guns used in the rampage.

A diary kept by Harris described his and Dylan Klebold's plans for continuing their murderous rampage through the school's neighborhood, sheriff's spokesman Steve Davis said.

"They wanted to kill 500 people, hijack a plane and take it to New York City," Davis said. He speculated that they chose New York because of the high population density.

He credited the quick response of sheriff's deputies with keeping the gunmen confined to the school. "Perhaps some major, major catastrophes were averted," Davis said.

On NBC's "Today" show, District Attorney Dave Thomas said of the plot to attack New York: "I suppose when you first hear it, you think that it's some horrible fantasy. But we now know that at least the first portion of those planned activities were, in fact, carried out."

Currency crisis main topic at international economic conference

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States and its major allies said yesterday that the world economy still faces a number of "serious challenges" stemming from a 20-month-old global currency crisis. They pledged closer cooperation to boost growth and help lift crisis countries out of recession.

The commitments came in an eight-page joint statement issued at the end of an afternoon of discussions among finance ministers and central bank presidents from the world's seven largest economies — the United States, Japan, Germany, France, Britain, Italy and Canada.

The Clinton administration sought during the meetings to impress upon Japan and its European allies that they must do more to boost growth in order to take pressure off America's soaring trade deficit.

The joint statement expressed concern about the need to achieve "more balanced growth among our countries to reduce external imbalances and to continue to support recovery in emerging markets."

While the group did not spell out how this increased growth would be achieved, its statement noted that the outlook remained favorable for continued price stability — a signal that interest rate cuts by individual countries could be used to boost domestic demand.

"In recent months, there have been improvements in some areas," the G-7 statement said. "A number of serious challenges remain, however, that will take time to resolve."

Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and other U.S. officials have been speaking with increased urgency in recent weeks about forecasts that Japan, already in its worst recession in 50 years, will see its economy shrink further this year.

Additionally, U.S. officials have become alarmed about recent downward reductions in growth prospects for Europe. The administration is concerned that unless other major powers return to more solid growth, the U.S. trade deficit, already at record levels, will balloon even higher and add to protectionist pressures in this country.

In addition to concerns about the outlook for recovery this year, the G-7 group gave a general endorsement to continuing with efforts to reform the global financial architecture to prevent or at least better cope with future Asian-style currency crisis. It endorsed a breakthrough that occurred Sunday with final approval by the 182-nation International Monetary Fund for a new contingency line of credit that will make billions of dollars of loans available to countries pursuing sound policies before a currency crisis hits.

The approval represents a major victory for President Clinton, who first advanced the idea last fall at the height of the global crisis after Russia shocked markets worldwide with a botched devaluation of the ruble.

The Russian economy went into a severe nosedive and the IMF cut off further loans. However, Russian officials, who met with the G-7 at the end of yesterday's discussions, emerged to express hope that they are near an agreement with the fund on economic reforms that will allow the IMF to resume lending.

"We have a good feeling about our position with the G-7," Russian Finance Minister Mikhail Zadornov told reporters.

While there had been speculation that the West might tie its resumption of financial support to Russia to that country dropping its objections to NATO's bombing of Kosovo, Zadornov said Kosovo never came up in the G-7 discussions of the Russian economy. The G-7 statement did condemn the "brutal violence against the ethnic Albanians of Kosovo" and pledged financial for neighboring countries in the region to help them cope with the war and the exodus of refugees. The IMF announced it will hold a donors' conference with more than 40 nations today.

Rubin enlisted the support of Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan to help convince other G-7 members that they needed to make greater efforts to support a fragile global recovery from a currency crisis. It began in Thailand in July 1997, hit other nations in Asia, reached Russia in 1998 and disrupted Brazil and other Latin American countries earlier this year.

The U.S. trade deficit hit a record $169 billion last year and is headed higher this year, triggering rising protectionist pressures in the United States. The steel industry, for example, is pushing the administration and Congress to cut off shipments of cheap steel from Japan, Russia and other nations.

Japanese officials said they discussed the steel issue during discussions with Rubin and Greenspan on Monday before the start of the G-7 meeting.

The G-7 favorably reviewed the efforts made so far to overhaul the global financial architecture. It did not indicate, however, that differences over remaining issues, such as how to involve the private sector and how to support greater debt relief for poor countries, had been resolved.

The statement said many of these issues will be taken up when Clinton and other G-7 leaders hold their annual economic summit, in Cologne, Germany, in mid-June.

The G-7 discussions took place around the annual spring meetings of the IMF and its sister lending organization, the World Bank. The mood at the meetings was decidedly different than last October, when the finance officials met following Russia's devaluation and default on billions of dollars in foreign debt. However, investor calm was restored when the Federal Reserve lowered U.S. interest rates, and U.S. stocks have returned to record levels since then. Many crisis countries have been exhibiting signs of life in recent weeks with stocks and currency prices rebounding, although their economies remain mired in steep recessions.

Minimum wage increase still a hot topic

WASHINGTON (AP) — Through gritted teeth, majority Republicans in Congress are struggling for the second time in four years with potentially unstoppable demands for an increase in the minimum wage.

"I'm practical enough to know it's going to happen" in the House, says Rep. Cass Ballenger, an ally of business who chairs a key subcommittee. "Why wait till the ax falls?" asks the North Carolina Republican, who promises that any measure will include tax breaks or changes in labor law designed as sweeteners to business groups that oppose a wage increase.

As was the case three years ago, the ax is in the hands of minority Democrats as well as New York Rep. Jack Quinn and other moderate Republicans with ties to organized labor. They argue that the lowest-paid workers deserve a benefit from the longest expansion in American peacetime history.

"Our country is prospering. The unemployment rate of 4.4 percent is the lowest in almost three decades," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said recently. "But millions of the country's hardest workers are not sharing in that prosperity."

center of Amherst to Big Y on Route 9. But Board member Hill Boss was concerned the route would not solve traffic problems.

"I don't see how a route going from the center of Amherst to Big Y is going to help traffic congestion in Amherst," Boss said.

But Board Chairperson Bryan Harvey said the route was not permanent, it is an experiment and after the six months they will decide if it should be funded again.

On the other side of transportation, parking, and possibly providing more of it free for a time, was discussed.

An article requesting the heads of recently installed parking meters in Amherst be removed while the parking permit system and parking garage are figured out was supported by the Board.

Articles for Town Meeting to vote on can be brought by anyone anyone, with enough signatures for it The Select Board votes whether to support, not support, or take no stand on an issue. The Board members then bring the articles, with their recomendation, before Town Meeting and explain why they made the recomendation they did. Town Meeting ultimately decides if an artlcle is passed.

Town Meeting begins tomorrow at 7:30 p.m. in the Amherst Reginal Middle School Auditorium.

/Union Week and U

This week is "Union Week," during which unions representing employees from trades all across campus are coming together to call attention to unions and union labor. It's worth wondering, however, why is this happening now? What's going on that's pissing off campus employees from faculty to food service, uniting them all along a common front?

Overall, the answer can be found in the anti-worker policies of privatization and union-busting, which have infected Massachusetts politicians and administrators with a vengeance. At UMass we see this trend realized as Whitmore threatens to privatize campus food services and bookstores, replacing union jobs with zero-wage Mclobs.

We see it as Governor Paul Cellucci screws with the contracts of grad student-teachers, monkey-wrenching pay raises and removing housing-vouchers from low-income students. We see it as Chancellor Scott tries to dismantle affirmative action, reducing access for ALANA students and employees. And perhaps most radically of all, we see it in the Governor's crackpot scheme for "Charter Colleges," which would dismantle the public university system all together.

> "Perhaps in 20 years they'll call degrees "McDiplomas:" quickly made, mass-produced and most importantly, of dubious value."
> Chris Vials

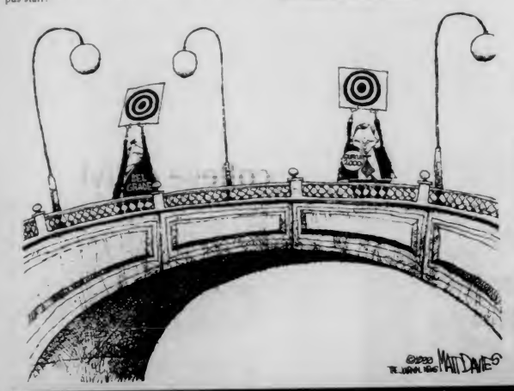
One of the express purposes of this last plan is to reduce the pay and autonomy of campus employees as much as possible, particularly teachers. For those of us like myself who are holding jobs or seeking jobs in academia, this would mean the death-knell of our careers.

The buzzwords fueling the drive to privatize public education are "improving quality." If campus employees are paid less and have less control, so the argument goes, quality is somehow liberated. But quality is the very thing which is destroyed in such a move. For what kind of quality do you get when you destroy diversity, job security and decent wages amongst campus staff?



Those who try to "improve quality" by slashing the livelihood of those who work here forget that without its teachers, staff, service workers and researchers, the University is nothing. This campus is only as good as those who do its work, for we are the University. We do the labor which distant bureaucrats like the privatizers in the state government know nothing about. (Jim Carlin, for example, the chairman of the current Board of Higher Education, is an insurance executive who's never taught a class in his life.)

So I'll tell you what kind of "quality" you get when you reduce labor costs to the minimum: McDonald's. Low-paid, unhappy workers who don't give a st if your order is right; cheap hastily-made products made more for efficiency's sake than for quality and a whole lot of nasty health effects for those who eat there (colon cancer, anyone?).

This is where public education is headed if the privatizers have their way. For those of you taking classes, it should concern you deeply. Because who's going to want to teach your class if they have no pay or intellectual freedom? Who's going to care if you get your financial aid check if the person in charge is paid minimum wage? What's your education going to look like if it is brought to you in the environment of high-turnover and apathy that accompanies low-wage work places? Perhaps in 20 years they'll call degrees "McDiplomas:" quickly made, mass-produced and most importantly, of dubious value.

Campus unions address these issues. We realize that by short-changing us, the state government is short-changing the education for everyone. This is what "Union Week" is all about. If you go to school at UMass, take notice of these trends, for they not only concern your education, they concern your future because one day your job could be on the chopping block too.

Super Cuts

Why can't I just talk to the barber like everyone else?

Whenever I get to the barber's, I sit, expectantly, waiting for my haircut. My legs bounce like a child's, my palms pressed between my knees in anticipation. I watch the barber cut hair, passing on bits of knowledge, laughing. I want to be in that chair — laughing, talking.

Then I get in the chair. "How you want your hair cut?"

"Just a trim. Trim it up."

Then silence. Me expecting something, the barber just going about his business. Why?

Way back in the day, barbers served many purposes. They let blood to cure disease, served as primitive therapists and still found time to take a little off the sides.

"Hail, Barabacus the Barber! I need mine humerus levelled out. I find myself slow to get up in the morning. And a shave, if thou hast time."

"No problem, Todd the Unfunny. You just sit in the chair. How art thine wyf and kinder? Great. Now just stay till while I slice your foot open."

And so began the intimate relationship between hairstylist and client. There he'd be, slicing open the client's foot, asking about the family and life in general.

"I do believe my son is possessed by some wicked spirit, Barabacus. He doth not enjoy the talking with other males about war and killing; instead he hangs out with the ladyfolk and discusses the removal of lice from blankets!"

"Bring him by. It is nothing a bleeding cannot cure."

Somewhere along the way, relationships became frayed. I believe it all started back when I was a kid in sunny Oreland, Pa. I'd go to the neighborhood barber every once in a while. I used to, in accordance with the style of the times, wear my bangs long and my sides shaved. I'm not sure what the exact name of this style was, but more than once I heard it referred to as "the sissy."

So I'd say, every time I sat down in the chair, "Gino, I want my bangs long, the sides shaved. Got it? If you do that, there's a nice big tip in it for you."

"Gotcha."

"Now, what do I want, Gino?"

"You want the sides shaved, leave the bangs."

"Bingo. I feel my wallet getting lighter already."

My bangs always ended up getting cut.

Mike Messaros \

Gino would be cutting away, circling around my head until he got to the front, and I'd start up. "Whoa! Don't cut the bangs, Gino!" Chicks dig long bangs." (P.S. They didn't.)

"Gotcha. I'm just evenin' 'em out a bit."

I figured he was a professional; he'd been to barber school. But everytime, when he gave me the mirror, my face fell. "You like the cut," Gino would half ask, half tell me.

"Yeah," I'd respond flatly, "I like the cut." Partly. I never had the heart to tell him. Mostly, though I was just a panzy.

"Hey, you go out and kill those ladies, you ladykiller."

"Yeah." But I never did kill the ladies, because, I thought, I didn't have the long bangs. (P.S. It wasn't the lack of bangs.) I didn't give Gino the full tip, though — that was my one bit of revenge. I'd use the rest to get a Choco Taco across the street.

Choco Taco could always cure my blues. (Think about it — the name alone makes it a little bit warmer in my tummy.) But it couldn't solve my problems. My sides were shaved, but my bangs were short. I was a failure in the all-so-important, "hair category."

Flash-forward to the present day. I just ask for a trim. In fact, cut the bangs. But conversation?

I sit there, expectantly, waiting for a hint of conversation. The kid next to me is getting his ear talked off about how hemp makes a great sweater, and behind me some woman is jawing on about her kids. Now, I'm not sure about the comfort of hemp over cotton, and I don't have any kids (none that I'll admit to, at least — wink, wink), but there are other subjects on God's green earth to talk about.

There are so many ways to start that conversation. Take, for example:

"Is cleanliness really next to Godliness? Or is it just that much closer to insanity?"

"Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin."

"Boy, that Collegian sucks."

"Marx said that religion is the opiate of the people. Who knew Richard Marx had that in him?"

If only. If only I could just say it. But for now, I'm just complacent to sit there, stare dumbly into the mirror and dream of Choco Tacos.

I mean, I'm not Sinbad. I'll bet Sinbad could talk about anything. But that's just not me.

Letters to the Editor

Wood "ignorant" about privatization

To the editor:

Alexander Wood's April 22, 1999 editorial, "I'll show you a protest," is representative of the ignorance on this campus about the issue of privatization. His comments are based not on facts, but on a superficial look at a more complex issue. He has seen only the selling points of privatization and not the price that this campus would pay for allowing it.

Campus Center Food Services, the University Store, and the Textbook Annex are University services. Their mission as services to the University community is compromised when self-operation is traded for private businesses.

The goal of a private business on campus would be to make enough money to turn over a piece to the University (landlord) and still return a profit to corporate headquarters. Put simply, more money would need to be extracted from this community via labor cuts and higher mark-ups.

Wood's arguments in support of privatization are not based on fact. First, the Dining Services and Auxiliary Services, the areas in which privatization is under consideration, are distinctly separate. In fact, if both were someday privatized they would compete with each other, their service aspects secondary to the internal conflict.

Second, the Textbook Annex is in no way a "monopoly." At UMass, unlike other universities, professors have the option of ordering books where they choose. Although textbook prices are virtually standard by publisher's price, the Annex works toward the lowest price, the highest buyback return, and the most convenience. It is a fact that a private company could do nothing to improve the Annex but modify the decor.

Regarding student businesses, Wood fails to understand that the 150 student jobs they provide are co-curricular training in business and life. As members of the only student business program of its kind in the United States, the students are leaders on campus. The businesses provide not only service to the community but a strong student culture as well.

Wood ridiculously thinks that students will have power over the practices of private companies. If Barnes & Noble increases the mark-up on books, students will pay more. There is nothing for students to bargain with, not even a University promise to serve students. Private companies have no responsibility to such promises. Contracts also are no guarantee for workers or customers, as after the inventory has been bought, the University, too, will be at the mercy of private business demands.

Wood obviously writes on an issue he doesn't understand. Privatization is a get-rich-quick scheme for the University. We need to ask ourselves who is getting conned here.

Wood should "check the facts"

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the column entitled "I'll show you a protest" by Alexander Wood. I was shocked at the blatant ignorance of Mr. Wood's editorial and his complete disregard for the facts surrounding the issue of privatization. To believe that textbooks will be cheaper is completely outrageous. We simply will not make more when we sell back our used books.

Perhaps Mr. Wood should sit down with some representatives from the Textbook Annex and listen to the measures that they take to ensure that there are books for the entire class enrollment (even though they rarely sell 100 percent of their inventory, which forces the Textbook Annex to incur a sizable cost).

I sincerely doubt that Barnes & Noble or any other corporation contracted will care about whether or not students have books. They will actually encourage professors to use new editions and limit the amount of used books that they sell. Then, students will have the option to sell books at the end of the semester for less money, and there will be fewer used books to purchase at discounted prices the next semester.

On the idea of protesting a contract that is brought into the University, check the facts on that one, too. Do you understand the how difficult contracts are to break? Many universities across the nation have privatized, then regretted it. Studies show that attempts to restore previous programs are nearly impossible.

As for Student Businesses, I am a co-manager of Campus Design & Copy and a proud member of the Board of Student Businesses. The student-run businesses strive to provide quality services to our fellow students. As non-profit organizations, we provide these services at the lowest possible cost. McDonald's won't do that, Kinko's won't do that, and Starbuck's won't do that. We protect the integrity of our fellow students; we do not view them as "customers." To private companies, all students are pure profit, period.

If privatization occurs, I hope you never need to obtain employment on campus. Private companies won't want to employ students due to limited availability. The 150 (once again, please at least try to be informed) students employed at student businesses are not the only ones at risk. Roughly 200 students are employed in the Campus Center by Food Services and Auxiliary Services. Do I need to mention the effects on work study and foreign students?

Finally, consider the actions of other universities. Duke University was offered $10 million to privatize some of its services. They declined in order to protect the integrity of their students and the university. This is an academic institution and attendance here should not mean involuntary subjection to exploitative capitalist practices.

U.S. foreign policy upholds capitalism

To the editor:

Why is it that I see daily pictures of burning villages, refugees, and massacre victims in Kosovo, but no pictures at all of Kurdish victims of far worse atrocities in Turkey? There are hundreds of thousands of Kurdish refugees. Their villages have been bombed and strafed by Turkish helicopters and jets, supplied by the United States.

Why are the Albanian separatists treated as freedom fighters in the U.S. media, while the Kurdish guerrillas are called terrorists? Why is an independent Kosovo deemed good and an independent Kurdistan bad?

The media coverage reminds us of the situation MIT professor Noam Chomsky describes in his book, Manufacturing Consent. Chomsky points out that extensive coverage was given to enemy atrocities in Cambodia, while simultaneously there was a near complete blackout of coverage of U.S.-supported atrocities in East Timor.

There is a logical explanation for the fact that a superpower like the United States is willing to use its Air Force in support of a guerilla army. After the Soviet Union and most of Eastern Europe went capitalist, only one socialist state remained: Yugoslavia. Therefore, the breakup of Yugoslavia was very important to the United States and other capitalist countries.

The Kurdish guerrillas are leftist in political orientation. The last thing the United States would want to see in the oil-rich Middle East is a socialist Kurdistan.

The prime motivating factor of U.S. foreign policy is the preservation of capitalism and enhancement of corporate power and profits. The tender concern expressed by government officials and the media for refugees and victims of atrocities is for public consumption only.

Quiz Show reveals America's lost innocence

COURTESY BARRY WETCHER

QUIZ SHOW
Directed By Robert Redford
with Ralph Fiennes, John Turturro, Rob Murrow

Quiz Show is actually a grim tale, a story about a fall from grace — one rarely told by Hollywood nowadays. And, it is precisely the careful storytelling, the human quality that makes Quiz Show such a great movie. Director, Robert Redford gives us a great sense of the time period, of America's hope and innocence, which soon will come crumbling down.

Quiz Show is based on the real life story of the quiz show scandals during the late 1950s. The movie follows Charles Van Doren, son of the most prominent intellectual family in the country, and his rise to super-stardom as quiz show champion and American hero. When young, Congressional lawyer Dick Goodwin gets word of a possible scandal on the shows, he launches an investigation into the one thing nobody saw.

Quiz Show revels in its strong characters: the poor, overachieving Jewish hero; the young idealistic lawyer; the scheming producers; the proud, but demanding father; and the wonder boy who gets caught up in the surrounding whirlwind. These characters reveal a wealth of themes about class divisions, about integrity, about entertainment, about parents and children, about trust, and about a country changing.

As the son just trying to live up to his father's precedent, Ralph Fiennes plays Charlie to perfection. He's inherently good, but can't help succumbing to popularity and fame. A wonderful scene, in which Charlie delays emerging from his limo until his own students — adoring fans — surround him, reveals this tragic flaw. Fiennes simultaneously embodies America's innocence and the man who will shatter it.

Indeed, the acting all around is downright spectacular. John Turturro gives a career best as Herbert Stempel, the righteous, dethroned champ determined to take down Charlie. In the end, he realizes they are not enemies, but victims both. Rob Murrow leaps to the big screen effortlessly as Dick Goodwin, who is determined to get TV. In the end, he realizes TV got them.

The movie leaves no room for redemption — what was done cannot be repaired; cynicism and disillusionment replace trust in America. Expectations that were so high for so many come crashing down to a painful reality. Meanwhile, Quiz Show dares to question, not so much its, decent but imperfect characters, rather the system and the consequences of its deception.

Mo' money, mo' problems for Nas

"It's funny how money changes situation." The sad truth of these prophetic words is that the all-mighty dollar has changed the thoughts and lived experiences of hip-hop's most prophetic mind, Nasty Nas.

When he first flipped that ridiculously catchy verse on MC Serch's thrill-ride single, "Back to the Grill," we had some conception of his potency. Then, his initial solo cut "Halftime," which was featured in the movie Zebrahead, solidified Nas as "king poetic with the flavor."

In 1994 he unleashed arguably the most lethal album in the history of rap music. Exhaling gusts of yellow-clouded blunt smoke, Nasir Jones was truly the Project Park Professor: Geared in Tim boots, baggy Guess jeans and hooded-down jackets, he observed the smallest details encompassing the hustles and struggles of impoverished urban adolescence. From his candle-lit pad on the 41st side of Queensbridge, he documented life through his eyes, scribbling rhymes into an overflowing notebook.

Virtually every line and even syllable on Illmatic fit together like a jigsaw puzzle, embedding his impeccable word structure into the most hallowed halls of poetry. As for production, Pete Rock, Premier, Q-Tip and Large Professor handled it, composing rare perfection in both beat and lyric.

But things changed... unsatisfied with record sales, his parenting label, Columbia, pushed for a more commercial appeal. The prospect of a prosperous income deeply affected Nasty's musical mindset, and quickly he metamorphasized into Escobar (named after the infamous drug-trader Pablo). His

Keter draws on Jewish Bible and history

Inspired by the Eastern European Jewish experience, the Holocaust, the Bible and Jewish mysticism, the Double Edge Theatre's troupe of artists will present Keter, The Crowning Song, the final play in a trilogy soon to be touring nationally.

The Song Trilogy, including the Song of Absence and the Song of Songs along with Keter, The Crowning Song, is the product of the Double Edge company's work over the past 10 years. Created by Stacy Klein, founder and artistic director of the company, Keter, The Crowning Song has been described by local critics as "raw experience" and "a form of worship."

Its performance space an Ashfield barn, the production traces the quarrels of a rabbi with himself, the world and his God. In a rumble of images, sound, text, song, dance and gesture, Keter, The Crowning Song has been said to overtake and embrace the spectator.

Audience members meet with the cast before and after the actual production, before to establish an understanding of the meaning of the play, and after to discuss this understanding.

The show is "a soaring journey through the shadows of darkness that awakens the memory of a hidden humanity in the soul," according to a press release.

The text of Keter, The Crowning Song draws from the work of Bruno Schulz, Rainer Maria Rilke and Shakespeare. Poetry is combined with excerpts from the Bible and Hasidic and Ladino ballads.

Performances will run Thursday through Saturday. All shows start at 8 p.m. Tickets are $15 for the general audience, $12 for students and seniors and $5 for returning audience members. Tickets for Thursday's show are half price. Double Edge Theatre is located on Route 116 in Ashfield. For information and reservations, call 413-628- 0277.

Working from loss

I drive in the morning, when the highways are nearly deserted, except for Caravans stuffed with sleeping children, tall, radio and vacation equipment. On the way, I stop for flowers, white tulips edged with pink. We talk for hours, me seated on the bench, she silent as usual, forgiving, patient.

I leave when it is noon, and by then people have invaded our solitude. They are solemn, pale, ghosts whom I recognize. I put my hand on the smooth, cool marble, and arrange the flowers so that they do not blow away. I get in my car and drive off, leaving out the details.

I return home to piles. Papers spilling out of notebooks, knocking over pictures, hiding tubes of Chapstick and bottles of White-Out. Everything bulges at the seams with importance. Someday it will be somewhere, serving its purpose.

I spend the rest of the afternoon coordinating, typing, calling, organizing and creating more piles. I try not to think about the people I saw when I left. I have never seen them before, but I know them. We have shared a cemetery on a beautiful winter's day. Only, I have come to visit, and they have come to say goodbye.

Chanel Dubofsky

The piles get larger instead of smaller. The months shrink into weeks and I pack myself full, trying not to think about it. I call this person, arrange a time and a place and ask them to call and confirm. I worry over attendance, looking bad, leftover food, grant money and all the paperwork I don't sleep so well.

Someone says to me, "If we save one life, isn't it worth it?" Your mother will still be proud of you."

Such simple words. I want to laugh. Who ever remembers such things, when you are stapling and flyering and leaving voice mail? I feel ashamed, silly, selfish, egotistical. Isn't that why I conceived this whole thing in the first place? So that there would be one less person in the world who had to feel like I do? My reaction to 11 years of fear of doctors, of chemotherapy, of courage, building an evening from the ground up.

Four hours of women, laughing, learning and eating, always eating. Talking, showing each other pictures of their daughters and granddaughters. Tossing around words like "advocacy," "prevention" and "strength." And healing, always healing.

We've spent five months stamping and addressing, designing and mailing and announcing. The pile has gotten smaller. The only thing left to do is wait.

Chanel Dubofsky is a Collegian columnist. She began organizing a symposium on women's health issues after her mother's death from cancer. The symposium will be held tonight from 5 to 9 p.m. at the University of Massachusetts Hillel House.

Infinite and ever–present worth

In the last edition of this column, I mentioned the custom of reciting a chapter from Pirkei Avot (sayings of the fathers, a section of the Talmud), every Shabbat between Passover and Shavuot (the holiday celebrating the giving of the Torah). This Shabbat we will be reciting chapter four, and again I have chosen one quote to present to you all.

Rabbi Ben Azzi used to say, "Do not regard anyone with contempt, and do not reject anything, for there is no man that does not have his hour and no thing which does not have its place."

When we think about what it means for something to be truly infinite, with no end and no beginning, we understand that time and space do not apply.

True infinity is present in its absolute completeness at any given place, in any given time. Wherever you are it is not only there, but all of it is there.

Because of this fact, we can understand that there is nothing that does not have an essential worth, because all is a direct manifestation of the foundation of all worth, G–d, the Infinite.

Even our material possessions, products of planned obsolescence and disposal can and must be seen as conduits to growth, all the more so for our fellow men and women. In the Midrash (commentary on scripture), elaborating on an event in the Torah, the patriarch Jacob crosses a river.

On the opposite bank he realizes that he has forgotten something on the other side, a few earthenware vessels. Jacob makes an involved journey back across the river simply to retrieve these relatively worthless items, and what does he find when he gets there?

He finds an angel of G–d, "wrestles' with it, and eventually wins. From this struggle he is granted a new name, Israel, for "struggling with G–d and succeeding."

From this point forward Jacob is tagged with the appellation "the perfect," and goes on to raise 12 righteous sons who become the tribes of Israel, a light unto the nations. This immense spiritual growth was achieved not through hours of meditation, but through considering the essential value of a few clay pots.

G–d is found not only in heaven, but also on earth; moreover, we cannot find heaven without first finding it on earth. The material is spiritual, the spiritual is material; there is no distinction. To illustrate this point, imagine an ocean.

From the shore we see separate waves, unique and distinct. This concept is "physicality." From below the surface of the water, all we see is ocean; there are no distinctions. Likewise, "spirituality" and "physicality" are different ways of perceiving the same existence.

Through all of this Ben Azzi reminds us that every man has his hour and everything has its place. We are not here to reject, to say "no," but to embrace, to elevate, to say "yes!"

The people who populate your world, the objects surrounding you in your home, they are not arbitrary, not disposable or obsolete, but an absolutely real aspect of G–d, of essential reality! Do not banish G–d/Truth to heaven, to "higher reality:" reveal it here, that it was always here.

> "The people who populate your world, the objects surrounding you in your home, they are not arbitrary, not disposable or obsolete, but an absolutely real aspect of G–d, of essential reality!"

Say yes to your life, to your loved ones, to your not–so– loved ones, to those you've never even met, say yes to everything; it all has a potential for holiness. It is our task to experience this holiness, oneness, and to help others to experience it as well. Going to temple is an endeavor of truth, of goodness and spirituality, but so can be going to work, giving charity, making love to your husband or wife, teaching your children, eating breakfast.

Hayyim Rothman

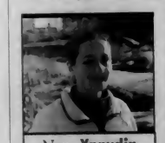
How is this possible? How does one take what we perceive to be finite and reveal its infinity, goodness and truth? It is accomplished by seeing such things as they truly are, not how we think or with them to be. The word "mitzvah" in Hebrew is derived from two roots: "tzav," which means "command," and "tzava," which means "together."

A mitzvah is a window through which we see something's true nature, by performing this mitzvah we reveal that nature, thereby revealing its absolute infinity and inherent goodness. Thus we literally see the "togetherness" of physical and spiritual, that the material and spiritual reality of something are one in the same.

We can then truly say "yes," this too is holy, all is holy, and all can be utilized because now we have a means of understanding what it actually is and how to utilize it. This makes every action an infinite action, for it is intimately bound up in the absolute reality, in G–d.

Living life to its fullest means infusing every moment of thought, speech and action with infinity, that every moment and that which fills every moment is an expression of Infinity and G–dliness.



"There is no man that does not have his hour and no thing that does not have its place," it is all worth the effort, go and find what has always been, and know that every act of truth, of beauty and of goodness brings the world that much closer to seeing everything as you have seen; that it is all good, all one, all infinite and of infinite value because it is all G–d.

Hayyim Rothman is a UMass student.

A message from the JSU treasurer

As the school year slowly rolls to its end, the Jewish Student Union (JSU) board is working on a variety of programs for next semester and is looking to fill two expected vacancies. The vice president of social action and community service position will be open due to Dan Kapner's expected leave for a study abroad program. Also, the position of secretary will be open, due to Jon Goldman's move into the treasurer's position after I leave.

Serving as treasurer on the student board has been a fulfilling, although sometimes frustrating, experience for me. Many students who come to the variety of Judaism–related programs don't know much about the work of the student board, as well as other student leaders, who make the events happen. Every strong program entails hours of work and coordination.

Natty Yagudin

In past semesters, much of the grunt work of programming has fallen on the student board. Officers have had to deal with the administrative and managerial duties as well as bear the weight of programming. I believe that the trend has been changing this semester. More students are willing to take on the role of programmers, and bring fresh ideas and energies to Jewish student life on campus. This shift has strengthened much of the board's work.

Some of the successful programs done this semester include the Freedom Seder, Israel Independence Day celebration and Holocaust memorial service. I found that my favorite part of these programs was not often the programs themselves. What moved and inspired me most were the small acts of dedication that I witnessed. I had the fortune of watching fellow students relentlessly work on a program until 3 a.m. and then collapse into bed with an awesome sense of great fulfillment.

As treasurer, I have had to deal with the Campus Activities Office and the Student Government Association (SGA) in relation to JSU's accounts. Along with Morry Korinow, the vice president of administration, I have taken care of all the things people never see when they come to a program: securing funds, booking rooms and making budgets.

More than anything, this job has caused me to realize that behind every good program there are many dedicated people I may not even know about. I was given a good look at what a strong program really means behind what is printed on the schedule. The experience has given me an in–depth look into finances, politics and work ethic. Although my experience was at times frustrating, I hope that the new board members will realize the value it holds.

Religion or education?

Each religion has its own day of rest. For the Jewish people, it is from sundown on Friday until sundown on Saturday. This is a time of rest for Jews and there are certain restrictions related to this day.

As finals approach, we are getting ready to take them and figuring out which days they are. As a Jew, I will not take an exam on Saturday. It is against my religion. People ask me why I do this if I do not observe Shabbat on a regular basis. My answer is simply that it is my choice, based on my principles. I was brought up to respect the Sabbath. I was not allowed to go out on Friday nights. However, my family did not strictly observe the Sabbath.

I find it very disconcerting that a public university such as this one would give an exam on a religious holiday. Exams are not given on Sunday due to blue laws and the fact that Sunday is a Christian day of rest.

Jaclyn Sobel

The difference is that on the Jewish day of rest, Jews are not allowed to do work, use money, carry things or write — basically we can neither "create" nor "destroy." In the Torah (Bible) it states many times that we should "observe the Sabbath and keep it holy…"

It is stated in the book of Deuteronomy that we should remember our ancestors and where we came from. We are to honor the work that G–d has done during the week. G–d created for six days and on the seventh day he rested. This is just one reason why we celebrate this holy day.

It is such an important time during the week that Jews all around the world leave work early to go home and clean for the day. Some Jews cook a festive meal and wear special clothes.

I feel very torn at this time of year. I have always changed my Saturday exams but I do not feel this is a fair practice. It is not right to make a student choose between religion and education. Whatever happened to the separation of church and state? If I wanted a religious education, I could have gotten one. I am here at a public, state university studying with people of all cultures and traditions. I would hope that their religious rights were enforced as much as I hope my religious right is known.

I urge all students who feel that this act of the administration is wrong to take action. I know that this issue has been brought up with the Student Government Association (SGA), but I do not know how far it went. I think it does not affect most senators, as it does not affect most of the school. However, there are people who are affected. I would and will stand up for the rights of others, but this fight (if you can call it that) cannot be won alone.

I have heard the argument that it takes too much to give another day of exams. Saturday is part of the weekend. We do not have classes during the semester on this day, so why should we be expected to take a final on this day? It is an infringement on the rights of students. I have been lucky and have been allowed to reschedule my exams. Not everyone has such understanding professors.

In the undergraduate catalog, there is a law called "Holiday Observance Policy." This basically states that students are allowed to reschedule exams due to religious beliefs, however "make–up examinations or work shall not create an unreasonable burden upon such school."

So we are allowed to make up our tests but only if we don't bother anyone while doing it? Does that not make sense to anyone else? I can understand giving ample time to your professor, but who is to say whether or not they feel inconvenienced?

How many students really know about this law and what it actually states? I am sure most know that they can reschedule their exam due to holidays, but do they know they can only do that if no one is inconvenienced? I don't care what religion you are, you should be able to reschedule your exam when it works for both you and your professor. You should not be expected to make up an exam at 8 a.m.

I knew a girl who had this happen to her during Rosh Hashanah (the Jewish new year). She was going home so she asked to make up her exam. She and some other students were told that the only time to make it up was at 8 a.m. on a certain day. I am not concerned with the time. I am concerned with the attitude of the instructor.

I am not claiming to know all of the reasons behind the University's practice. I have not done extensive research on the topic, but I do know that Saturday finals have been a longstanding practice of the University. I know that Saturday is a very special and very holy day for Jews. I know that exams are not given on Sundays. I know that during the regular semester we don't have class on Saturday.

I will be honest — most Jewish students don't care that exams are on Saturday. I am one of the few who does. The ones that do should be taken into consideration. How would you like it if someone planned for you to take a test which counted so much toward your grade, but your religious practices did not allow you to take the test on the day it was being held? I will tell you, it is not an easy experience. Finals are stressful enough without having to check out the day they are given and rescheduling.

This semester I happen to have two exams on Saturday. I do no plan on taking them then. I plan on moving them both. Hopefully other students will start to take a stand and move their exams.

I do not want to start a major uproar. I would like to start some action and major discussion.

Palestinian talks with Israel possible

By Samar Assad
Associated Press

RAMALLAH, West Bank — The Palestinian parliament today left open the door to continued peace talks with Israel, passing a resolution that does not mention a declaration of statehood on May 4.

The nonbinding resolution, adopted 41-1 with two abstentions, was issued a day before Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was to convene a senior PLO body, the 124-member Palestinian Central Council, to make the final decision on the statehood issue.

May 4 was the target date for completing a final peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. A senior Israeli official who spoke on condition of anonymity said the United States is proposing a new target date of May 2000 and that Israel would accept the one-year extension.

PLO official Hassan Abdel Rahman said he believes the United States does not want negotiations to extend beyond a year. "The Americans have said they do not want open-ended negotiations." Meanwhile, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who is facing a tight battle for re-election May 17, took an even tougher stand against Palestinian statehood than he has in the past.

"As long as I'm prime minister, it doesn't matter what he (Arafat) gets on an international level, this (a state) he will not have," Netanyahu said during a campaign stop in the central Israeli town of Kiryat Malachi.

He also claimed credit for the Palestinians' apparent willingness to forgo a statehood declaration, saying that Israel's threat to annex parts of the West Bank kept Arafat from making a unilateral move.

"As a result of this statement and our stance for the past few months, the Palestinian Authority realized that it had to back down," Netanyahu told Israel radio.

The Palestinian Central Council was widely expected to decide to postpone a statehood declaration. Council head Salim Zanoun said the session could last for days and even until after Israel's election.

Young unplugs for a Conn. show

By Matthew Perrault

NEIL YOUNG
Oakdale Theatre
April 25

Before Neil Young even played a note on Sunday night, the sold–out crowd at Wallingford, Conn.'s Oakdale Theatre knew they were in for a truly unique experience.

An announcement stating — "At Neil's request, the ushers have been instructed not to seat anyone once the performance has begun," came on before Young came out on stage. This abnormal request seemed to only energize the audience, which was already buzzing with anticipation of one the most well–respected musicians of today.

Once Young did appear, walking slowly from backstage, more than three–quarters of the audience was already on their feet in applause.

Young played a solo performance, entirely acoustic, lasting two–and–half hours. The show featured 20 songs in a two–set performance that felt like a walk through the musical history of the phenomenal artist. Leaving his backing band behind, Young stripped himself down to the bone and before the night was over, touched upon four decades of music, leaving the Oakdale begging for more.

Young opened the show with "Tell Me Why" from his 1973 release After the Gold Rush. The set also included solid performances in "Pocahontas" and the more current "Man of War" off of Harvest Moon released in 1992. Young ended the nine–song, one–hour set with what he called "a simple drug song, but it's different now," the Farm Aid anthem "Homegrown."

All alone on stage, Young spent most of the night surrounded in a tight semi–circle of eight guitars and a banjo. Also, dispersed around the stage were two pianos and a pipe organ that Young would visit whenever he wanted to stretch his legs and change the pace of the show.

Young methodically picked up a different instrument for almost every song, switching guitars, harmonicas, and pianos. He took his time, pausing for a good minute or so after each number to collect himself. The audience sat on the edge of their seats in complete awe.

After a half–hour intermission, Young returned to the stage to perform crowd–pleasing versions of "The Needle and the Damage Done" from the 1972 album Harvest and "Song of Love." The set also included a tremendous version of "Long May You Run" played on the pipe organ and "Harvest Moon" that featured a huge, red moon on the back screen.

After more than two hours of music, Young still played a double encore that included three songs — "Good To See You," and the classics "Old Man" and "Sugar Mountain" that got the crowd singing along for the first time all night. Young left the stage to a roaring ovation.

This acoustic tour is a tune–up for Young as he prepares for this summer's much anticipated reunion tour with Crosby, Stills and Nash. Sunday night's show proved why he deserves all the respect he receives.

In his final lyrics Young sang, "Oh to live on Sugar Mountain, with barkers and the colored balloons / You can't be 20 on Sugar Mountain / But you're thinkin' that leaving there too soon… You're leaving there too soon." On this night, we did.

boots and hoods were primarily 'cashed–in' for white suits and cowboy hats as Nas gleamed with an identifiable appeal. However, this transformation seemingly removed him from the inspirational scenery of park benches as money had indeed changed the outer circumference of Nas' character/image.

The audio evidence of this new style came in 1996 with the release of his sophomore album It Was Written. Although many tracks (like the brilliantly under–rated "I Gave You Power") proved that Nas had not lost the grit of gab, his freshly–formed, luxurious mobster persona, gave the album a uncanny sourness. Production plummeted as well and, despite his commercial success, he alienated those of us who were there when he was simply Nasty. Yet through horrific projects (such as The Firm), Nas has maintained his ability to flex a poisonous pen. On the Men In Black soundtrack in 1997, he spit a couple of chillingly meaningful verses, which introspectively examined the subtle joys of life and somewhat explained his personal transformation, "went from Nasty to Nas/ Nas to Escobar."

Now his third album is upon us. Fully prepared to address his harshest critics (with middle–finger extended), his latest solo project appears to seek the median ground between his first to albums. But sadly it slips through those gaping gaps of mediocrity.

I Am… begins with amazing potential. The Premier– produced "New York State of Mind II," shines, haunts and even brings us back to the melodic grittiness of Illmatic. But after that it sputters like a high–mileage Chevy Nova. The controversial "Hate Me Now," which features Puff Daddy (who sings the hook), does not measure up to its epic– sounding aura as it secretes stale lyrics and annoying background antics from Sean John.

"Money is My Bitch" is an interesting concept with a decent beat, but Esco ruins it by trying to belt out the chorus. "I Want to Talk to You" is perhaps the most nerve–racking song Nas has ever recorded and on "Big Things" he tries to flip a sped–up style which does not work for him. The albums sharpest moments come on "Favor for a Favor," featuring a stellar cameo by Scarface, which is a riveting song that is depleted by a tedious chorus. This becomes a re– occurring theme.

"Kissing," for instance, includes a fabulously placed R. Kelly loop, but the fundamental stupidity attached to this tune nearly makes it unlistenable. Production–wise, I Am… is significantly tighter than It Was Written, but so many God–awful, unintelligent choruses ultimately ruin many of its brightest tracks.

"We Will Survive," on which he dictates letters to 2Pac and Biggie, is lyrically poignant but is drowned by a drowsy beat. (Of course Primo's "Nas is Like" is tighter than turtleneck shirts but we've been listening to this cut for like three months now.) "Small World," "Ghetto Prisoners" and "Life Is What You Make It" are all enjoyable but unfortunately make easily forgettable anecdotes.

Carefully sifting through I Am… will unveil many moments of prophetic lyrical excellence, but ultimately it only lives up to the mediocre standards set on It Was Written. Nas is still a most formidable songwriter, he's just going to have to come with a little more to win over those who still go chills from pumping Illmatic.

Messina leads Boston Music Awards

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Country phenomenon Jo Dee Messina beat out Aerosmith, Paula Cole and the Mighty Mighty Bosstones to claim the Act of the Year award at last Thursday's 12th Annual Boston Music Awards.

Messina, who has owned the country charts with her 1998 release, I'm Alright, also won Outstanding Female Vocalist and Outstanding Country Act.

Four awards went to rising blues star Susan Tedeschi, who won Album of the Year (indie label); Single of the Year (indie label); Outstanding Female Vocalist (indie label); and Outstanding Blues Act.

Godsmack shocked the music industry when their low– budget, self–titled album was certified gold. They accepted the Debut Album of the Year award.

The Push Stars, awaiting their Capitol debut next week, picked up the Rising Star award, while the Mighty Mighty Bosstones took Outstanding Debut Rock Band, while Album of the Year went to UMass alumni Buffalo Tom.

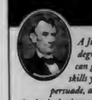
Future music sensation Melissa Ferrick claimed Outstanding Folk Rock Band, while Jennifer Kimball, formerly of The Story, earned Outstanding Debut Contemporary Folk Album.

The Gigolo Aunts, on Counting Crows' Adam Duritz's label, snagged Outstanding Local Rock Band honors.

My Favorite Relative, who have created quite a stir in the Boston club scene were nominated for six awards and claimed two of them, Outstanding Debut Rock Band and Debut Album of the Year (indie label).

Steven Tyler won Outstanding Male Vocalist, while his band Aerosmith acquired Video of the Year for "I Don't Want to Miss a Thing."

The awards also kicked off the NEMO Music Showcase and Conference. The NEMO Music Showcase featured over 200 emerging artists from around the world performing at 20 different venues in the Boston area. Participants witnessed intimate performances by such impressive acts as Two Ton Shoe, Quick Fix, The Shelia Divine and Superhoney among others.



The NEMO Music Conference featured two days of panels, mentor sessions and a trade show at the Swissotel. Individuals were able to discuss industry trends with major label A&R reps along with attending a songwriting workshop hosted by Ferrick and Kimball.

Other discussions ranged from marketing techniques to contract negotiations with industry representatives.

Northampton hosts a much smaller version of the NEMO Music Showcase and Conference this week. It kicks off this Wednesday at the Words and Pictures Museum and features over 100 acts at 12 different venues. Tickets are available at the Northampton Box Office or by calling 1–800–THE– TICK.

Slaney banned from IAAF as records erased

By Andreas Evagora
Associated Press

MONTE CARLO, Monaco — Mary Slaney was given a retroactive two-year ban yesterday day after an arbitration panel found her guilty of taking banned drugs before the 1996 U.S. Olympics trials.

The International Amateur Athletic Federation decision, for which is there is no appeal, scraps from the record books Slaney's performances between June 1996 and June 1998 — including the silver medal she won for the 1,500m at the 1997 World Indoor Championships in Paris.

The IAAF imposed the ban after the arbitration panel said there was "failure to establish by clear evidence that an abnormal T-E test was attributable to pathological or physiological conditions," according to IAAF spokesman Giorgio Reineri. Slaney had expected the ruling, her lawyer said.

"It was clear that this was where this was headed," attorney Jim Coleman said. "They weren't interested in whether the test was valid. They were simply trying to find a way to get out of this mess they got themselves into. They decided the way to get out of it is to simply dump on Mary and try to save their tests.

Slaney, 40, had claimed that the widely-used testosterone-epitestosterone test is unreliable for women who are taking the birth control pill in their late 30s or 40s, an argument refuted by the IAAF.

In a statement, the IAAF said the decision by USA Track and Field on Sept. 16, 1997, to clear Slaney of an offense was "erroneous." The IAAF said it was imposing a retroactive ban from June 17, 1996, the day of the positive test, until June 16, 1998.

"As a result of this decision, all results and awards that Mary Decker Slaney may have obtained in competition during her period of ineligibility are to be considered null and void," the statement said.

The IAAF said the ruling was "final and binding" on all parties, with no right of appeal.

The decision ends Slaney's long-running case.

Slaney, considered the greatest women's distance runner in U.S. history and a world champion at 1,500 and 3,000 meters in 1983, gave a urine sample during the 1996 U.S. Olympic trials that showed a T-E ratio above the 6-1 limit.

The T-E test, used by many sports, detects the presence of testosterone.

will play in the earlier meeting. On Thursday, the consolation game will start at 11 a.m. followed by the championship matchup at 2 p.m.

UMass looks to defend its perfect 5–0 mark. On April 18, 1996, it soundly spanked Harvard 13–2 as Chad Paronto soldiered through for his first win of the season. Minutemen outfielder Nate Murphy went 2-for–3 with a triple and a three-run home run to lead the offense. In the championship round, then-junior Scott Barnsby tossed a complete game four–hit gem to hold onto a 1–0 lead over NU. Barnsby would earn tournament Most Valuable Player accolades as Murphy drove in the winning run on a sacrifice fly.

The next year, Barnsby would top himself to lead the Minutemen to another pencil–shaving close 1–0 win. The right–hander hurled the first nine–inning, no–hitter for UMass since 1957 and the first no–no in Fenway since the Red Sox's Dave Morehead completed the feat on Sept. 16, 1965 in a 2–0 downing over Cleveland. Massachusetts's Adam Robinson took to the mound as the Minutemen beat Harvard 11–4 to win its second Beanpot title.

Last year, UMass easily took BC 7–2 in the first meeting between the two teams. Barnsby won again with seven strikeouts but was outshone by his teammate, second baseman Muchie Dagliere. The senior set a UMass single– season hitting streak record at 29 straight games (the streak ended at 31) as he went 3–for–4. Barnsby's Fenway final standings are a remarkable 3–0, with an ERA of 0.62 and 21 Ks in 26 innings of work.

Today, UMass' Todd Samolewicz will be one of the most privileged baseball fans as he will climb the same mound where Roger Clemens once struck out 20 Mariners on April 29, 1986.

UMass coach Mike Stone looks to repeat his team's past performances, but understands that the two games are more that just that.

"It's a special place where people from New England love to play," he said. "It's a special day for the kids. Though, the one thing is that it's hard to see from the dugout. [From the dugout] you are on your way down and you don't feel as much a part of the team."

But you're still a part of the dream that keeps the grand ol' pahk standing.

younger team, which she feels may be the best she has played for in four seasons at UMass. "It's a great group of girls. It's been interesting and a lot of fun."

And the positive mind–set surrounding her elastic bracelet has made the year even more enjoyable for Galas.

It's only a small band, but it's rather fitting. She didn't borrow Scooter's bat or helmet. Just a tiny, unnoticeable object that generates some extraordinary power — much like Galas herself.

When someone mentions the rubber band to her, she glances down at the dirty elastic around her wrist, perhaps hoping for one more wish.

"I'd like to hit one out of [Totman Field] someday, but we'll see," she said. "I'll go with the triples right now."

Yet it's somewhat obvious that she's lying about being satisfied with triples. Galas hasn't so much as practiced without her rubber band since she put in on for the first time.

But ask her where her power comes from, and she won't lie.

She'll smile and tell you that it's all in the wrist.

Carolina gains the upper hand with playoff win

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — A disputed third-period goal gave the Carolina Hurricanes undisputed possession of the lead in their playoff series against the Boston Bruins.

Andrei Kovalenko's skate was in the crease when the puck got past Byron Dafoe 2:54 into the period. The Hurricanes then held on for their second straight 3–2 win and took a 2–1 lead in the best–of–7 Eastern Conference quarterfinal last night.

Game 4 is scheduled for tomorrow night in Boston.

With the score tied at 2, Kovalenko was credited with the goal after Robert Kron passed the puck from behind the goal line to Dafoe's left. The puck appeared to precede Kovalenko into the crease and ricochet off Dafoe.

Officials reviewed the play on video as Boston coach Pat Burns yelled at them.

The Bruins split the first two games in Carolina, but a return home wasn't enough to give them the series lead. In last year's playoffs, they were 0-3 at home in losing the first round to Washington in six games.

The Bruins have lost their last four playoff series, while the Hurricanes are in the playoffs for the first time in seven seasons, two in Carolina after moving from Hartford.

Goals by Carolina's Gary Roberts and Ray Sheppard, who scored to win Game 2 in overtime, and Boston's Sergei Samsonov and Anson Carter left the game tied after two periods.

Dafoe, who led the NHL with 10 regular-season shutouts and added one in the playoff opener, lost his bid for another just 1:05 into the game.

That's when Roberts scored his first goal of the playoffs. Jeff O'Neill put the puck in front of the net to the left of Dafoe, who sprawled after it. Roberts then gained control and scored from in close on the first shot of the game.

Orioles dumbfounded over losses; lack of production serves as culprit

Coach Miller under fire as baseball's third–highest paid team toils

By David Ginsburg
Associated Press

BALTIMORE— Ray Miller evidently has had enough of merely throwing his hands up in disgust — he's now pounding a wall. Such is his frustration with the Baltimore Orioles.

The Orioles, who have the worst record in baseball, are a mess. Despite owning the third-highest payroll in the majors and arguably the best right-handed hitter in the game, Baltimore has sputtered to a 4-14 start that has left the once-proud franchise hurting and Miller nursing a fractured hand.

After Orioles pitchers issued 14 walks Sunday in an embarrassing 11-10 loss to Oakland, Miller slammed his right hand against a wall and ripped his players in a brief, profanity-laced session with the media.

"Obviously I'm frustrated," the manager said, hiding his wrapped hand under his desk. "I feel sorry for the fans. You pay that much money to see a game, you expect to see professionals play. Today some people weren't professional. By that I mean the ability to throw the ball over the plate. Fourteen walks is inexcusable."

Mike Timlin walked two and suffered his first blown save by allowing a three-run homer in the ninth inning. Timlin, one of 12 new players brought in this season by new general manager Frank Wren, confirmed Miller's viewpoint about where blame for the horrid start should be directed.

"He calls the shots but we throw it, we catch it, we hit it. It's in this room," he said. "We're not doing anything well right now."

Ultimately, however, the manager is the one held accountable for the team's performance. And Miller may soon lose his job if the Orioles don't begin to justify the $78.5 million that owner Peter Angelos is paying to field a team that was expected to contend for a playoff spot.

Wren said yesterday that the Orioles aren't about to give up on the season, or Miller, after just 18 games.

"What you look for in baseball is trends. Right now we're in a bad trend," Wren said. "What we need to do is try to find out how to turn it around. That's what I'm talking about today with my staff... I'm certainly not going to make any public personnel decisions at this point."

Asked his opinion of Miller's actions and words Sunday, Wren said, "With everybody calling for Ray's head, now is not the time to critique the manager through the media."

Angelos handpicked Miller for the job after accepting a controversial resignation from Davey Johnson in 1997, less than one month after the Orioles' second straight appearance in the AL championship series.

Men's tennis takes 6th in A–10s

By Seth Szilagyi and James Piehl
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team had an up–and–down weekend as it went 2–2 to take sixth place in the Atlantic 10 Tournament held in Blacksburg, Va.

In the first match of the tournament, the Minutemen, the No. 5 seed, beat the No. 12 seed La Salle, 5–2. Senior Todd Cheney defeated Ryan Gargullo at the No. 1 singles, 6–1, 6– 3. Junior Rob Manchester was victorious at No. 2, beating Rehan Chauldry, 6–0, 6–0. Both Cheney and Manchester were moved up a position, as the normal No. 1 man, Steve Prisco, sat out the first match.

In a surprising return, Parsa Samii re–entered the line–up with a 6–0, 6–0 thrashing of Scott Daly. Samii had fractured his thumb earlier in the season, and had not played in a match since March 14.

The doubles found sophomore Josh Bainton and Manchester teaming up for the first time, beating Chauldry and Daly, 8–0. The doubles point was nailed down with a default win by Bill Greener and Todd Champeau over Andrew Elder and Andrew Pessano.

With the win against La Salle, the Minutemen moved on in the tournament to play No. 4 seed Dayton, in a second– round match–up.

UM lost to Dayton earlier in the season, (5–2) and were looking to settle the score, but went down to the Flyers by the same score in a hard fought match. Manchester returned to No. 3 singles, winning his second match of the tournament, 6–2, 2–1 over Brad Nykiel. Bo Navarro picked up the only other point for the Minutemen with a three–set win over Steve Thompson, 4–6, 6–3, 6–4. The match also saw Cheney extending his all–time wins in doubles play, teaming with Navarro to win 8–4.

After the loss to Dayton, the Minutemen were dropped into the loser's bracket of the tournament, playing No. 7 seeded Xavier for the right to advance to the fifth–place game.

UMass was victorious for the second time in the tournament, as it pulled out a win, 4–3. No. 1 player Steve Prisco picked up his first win of the weekend, defeating Kyle Bates, 6–4, 1–0. Manchester won his third singles match of the tournament beating Brent Cullen, 6–3, 7–6 (3). Bill Greener got back to his winning ways with a 6–5, 6–1 victory over Kevin McEnery.

The doubles teams were all successful, as the teams of Manchester–Prisco, Cheney–Navarro, and Bainton–Champeau, won, 8–6, 8–5, 8–6, respectively.

The Minutemen moved on to the fifth–place consolation game looking to finish up the tournament and their year with a win. Duquesne interfered with their plans defeating UMass, 4–3.

Prisco showed the promise of things to come, with his second straight win, beating Garth Levin, 6–3, 1–6, 6–3. Greener finished his stellar season with a 6–4, 7–6(5) victory over Dan Somers.

Manchester was once again the hero of the tournament for the Minutemen, as he won his fourth straight of the weekend and was named to the All–Tournament team for the second consecutive year.

Top–seeded Virginia Tech won the championship for the fourth consecutive year, defeating No. 6 seed George Washington, 4–0.

Minutewoman tennis squad ends conference tourney in third place

A–10 tournament was a roller–coaster for UMass

By Jason Owens
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team took third in the Atlantic 10 tournament this weekend by defeating fourth– seeded George Washington on Sunday. The victory followed a disappointing loss to Temple in the semifinals, and a win against Fordham in the second round.

Singles star Ola Gerasimova won two of her three matches for the weekend and was named to the Atlantic 10 tournament All–Championship team for her second consecutive season. She also won all three doubles matches she played in.

The second–seeded Minutewomen received a bye for the first round of the tournament and then faced off against unseeded Fordham in the second round. There they easily beat the Rams behind the strong play of Gerasimova, who won from the No. 2 singles spot and teamed with Helena Horak to win at No. 1 doubles, 8–1.

The win against Fordham set up a much anticipated matchup with arch–rival Temple, who entered the tournament seeded third. Unfortunately for UMass, Temple was more than ready for the Minutewomen.

"Temple really came out to play us," UMass assistant coach Debbie Ginn said. "[For Ola] It was a tough match against a girl who was really on fire. [Temple] stroked the ball well."

The Owls, who match up well with the Minutewomen talent–wise, took five of the six singles matches and defeated UMass in the No. 1 doubles match. Co–captain Jackie Braunstein played well, losing 3–6, 6–2, 6–4.

The lone bright spot for Minutewomen's singles squad was Robyn Lebovitz, who defeated the Owls' Nina Kumar, 6–2, 6–3.

The Minutewomen managed to win the Nos. 2 and 3 doubles slots, with Gerasimova and Allie Tross winning at No. 2 by forfeit, and Lebovitz and Annie Hamilton taking No. 3 doubles by default.

The loss to Temple, who went on to lose in the finals to repeat champions Virginia Tech, didn't dampen the Minutewomen's spirits as they faced off with George Washington on Sunday. The Colonials, seeded fourth in the tournament, had lost to eventual champions Virginia Tech in the semifinals, couldn't handle the pressure put on by UMass.

It was a team victory for UMass as the Minutewomen took eight out of nine matches from GW. Horak, getting more comfortable in the role of No. 1 singles player, started off the win parade with a 6–1, 6–2 win over Sarine Weingarten. Gerasimova followed up with a 6–1, 6–3 win over GW's Ghada Skaff from the second singles spot.

UMass' lone loss for the day came at the hands of Holly Huntey, who defeated No. 3 Braunstein in a tough three–set match.

The Minutewomen went on to sweep the doubles matches 3–0, as Gerasimova and Horak teamed up for a 9–7 win, followed by a default at two, and an 8–5 victory for Lebovitz and co–captain Gillian Kane at the third slot.

"They certainly stepped it up and I was pleased with the way the girls played," Ginn said.

UMass avoided any early let–downs in its second game, shell–shocking Iona with six unanswered goals in the opening frame. Four more scores in the second quarter, coupled with aggressive perimeter defense and another stone–wall job by Sinkwich in the net, gave UMass a 10–1 halftime lead. Coach Dan McOsker then went to his bench, resting his starters while his second unit continued to dominate.

"Our bench got to play a big part," Clement said. "We know we have great depth, and can sub without letting up."

Clement, Grogan and sophomore Katie Mayer each scored twice in the decisive 14–2 win. Late goals by Erin Hillier, Alexa Olsen, Vanessa Solis and Megan Thompson helped seal up the victory.

The final round–robin game pitted UMass against Princeton, whose 7–3 downing of the Maroon and White on April 10 and subsequent bragging had more than a few UMass players out for blood.

"We had a lots of extra motivation to beat Princeton," Grogan said. "They talked a lot of trash since the last time."

But the Tigers were doing more than just talking Saturday, as they jumped out to a 3–2 lead after one quarter of play. UMass locked the contest with an unanswered goal in the second, only to watch Princeton go back up by one in the third.

But the fourth quarter belonged to Massachusetts, as their front–and–lanes defense tightened up and Californian Perry blasted in the game winner.

"We were really on top of our game defensively against Princeton," Clement said. "We were tested by them early, but we came together at the end."

Along with Perry's two goals, UMass got two scores from Grogan and one from sophomore Sarah Newell in the 5–4 win.

Hott Harvard played the role of dark horse at Easterns, trampling favored Princeton to set up a semifinal showdown with the Minutewomen. UMass' 3–0 record against the Crimson this year, which included a 12–5 drubbing in last weekend's New England Championships, may have set the Maroon and White on a dangerous high horse of their own coming into this matchup.

"We might have overlooked Harvard," Grogan said. "They played a great tournament, and it almost cost us."

Scoring was at a premium in the UMass–Harvard game, as both teams dropped aggressively on defense whenever the ball reached the two–meter. Sinkwich again came up huge for the Minutewomen, collecting nine saves and helping to send the game into double–overtime.

The Maroon and White offense righted itself in the second extra set, and UMass prevailed 6–5 to lock up a spot in Sunday's final. Clement's hat trick paced the scoring against Harvard, along with solo goals from Goodhue, Hupp and Laurie Edwards.

"I talked to the Harvard coach afterward, and he was amazed at how well they executed," Grogan said. "They were out of their minds, playing at a higher level than we've ever seen them play."

Redemption was the name of the game in the final, as UMass sought to bury the memory of its April 11 folly against the Lady Terps. Stifling field defense from the likes of Edwards and Lindsay Crenshaw had Maryland simply baffled early, and the Minutewomen capitalized by taking a 3–1 lead into the second half.

The third frame saw an absolute dogfight, as the teams traded goals amidst a flurry of stops and counter–attacks. After a somewhat sluggish start, the Lady Terps seemed to come alive late in the game.

"They came out a little flat, certainly not as intense as we expected," Hupp said. "But we knew we couldn't let up or lose focus, so we kept playing like we were down by a goal."

Sinkwich again shone between the poles with eight saves, and UMass captured the championship with a 5–2 win. By virtue of its remarkable title run, the team will now compete in the United States Water Polo Collegiate I National Championships, slated for May 7–9 in California.

"A lot of people take Eastern teams for granted," Grogan said. "It's time to show them what we're made of."

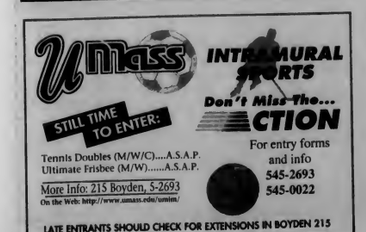
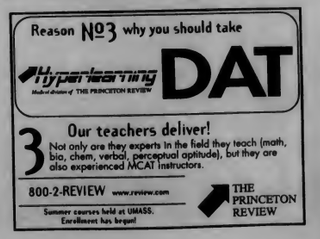
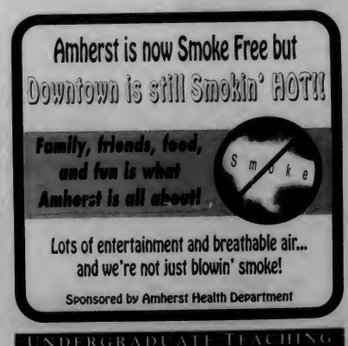
The 2000 Olympic hopeful has been invited to the U.S. National Team Training Camp this June, where the trials for the PAN–American Games will be held as well. LaVallee will also be competing for a spot at the World University Games, which are to be held in Spain this year.



LaVallee defeated tough competitors like former Olympian John MacReady last year at the U.S.A. National Championships, and this year, a top spot at this summer meet is crucial for his potential Olympic career.



"The World Championship team is chosen from the top finishers at USAs," LaVallee said. "And the World Championships is the most important meet aside from the Olympics. It gets you recognized internationally, and prepares you mentally for the Olympics."



Compared to most of the competitors this weekend, LaVallee's routines had much more difficulty in them — preparing him for the grueling meets to come, which is why his scores were as high as some of his competitors'. But with routines with literally twice the difficulty in them, and scores still within the top six, this Minuteman shows that he has the potential to represent the U.S. at the World Championships and possibly the Sydney Olympics in 2000.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Politics may be unavoidable today, especially in and around the workplace. Watch what you say during morning and evening hours.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Remember when you "put off until tomorrow" what you "could have done today?" Well, believe it or not, tomorrow is upon you now.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You can best assert yourself today by letting go of the past, disposing of prejudices, and moving ahead with a renewed perspective.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be quite easily pleased today, but only by the right people. Activity after dark may border on the unusual, but you can handle it.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You needn't be harsh and critical today, even when you "tell it like it is." There are times when a little tact goes a long, long way.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You should be able to provide for a friend or loved one with precisely what he or she wants at this time. It's never too early to be generous!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Your eyes may deceive you today, your ears may fool you, and your mind may play tricks, but your heart is sure to lead you in the right direction.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Messages from afar may contain more important information than you had expected. You may want to take the time to read "between the lines."

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Some may mistake your independence for arrogance today, but others will recognize you as the leader that you are. It's time to "share the wealth."

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Use your imagination today and you'll satisfy someone who is making unusual demands. In the end, what pleases you will please him or her, too.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You can take control, and wield your authority in such a way that you please others. Who says you can't have it all?

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You're likely to understand a difficult concept today which eluded you only a short time ago. You can begin making key personal shifts as a result.

Beanpot next up for UM

It's a place where baseball belongs. No, it's more than just a place, it's the house that Boston built. Originally a dream of state government and businessmen, now it's a testament to Red Sox fans who are living and breathing through their sometimes fickle yet magically sweet memories and sentimentalism.

Kathleen Ralls

It's Fenway Park, the 87-year-old house that once housed Ruth. Despite threats to tear the old heap of metal sloshed with mute green paint, whose seats sometimes angle all wrong and parking facilities leave many fans no option but to park in the Mobil gas station for $20 or more, it still stands.

A Fenway Frank is a must, because they are not the same as in the supermarket, no matter what anyone says. And every other inning of organ play takes a spectator back to when Ted Williams and Carl Yastrenski once wore the all- American white, blue and red uniform.

Some things have changed. The press box and ritzy, plexi- glassed-in "The 600 Club" are new additions to the landscape. But half the lore of the game are the constant cheers and expensive popcorn and pretzel buffet put on by Harry M. Stevens.

The Green Monster. In a day and age in which baseball is chastised for its longevity (in hours per game, that is), the 37-foot wall envelopes the very essence of baseball. The time between pitches is enough to chase a foul ball or to chatter among fans. And the time between innings is for taking a walk, checking out the souvenirs or purchasing a Coke. Baseball is still a social event. Baseball today is what it is supposed to be, in spite of its naysayers.

This summer, Fenway will host the 1999 All-Star Game between the American and National Leagues; a clash between the designated hitter and the duty-doubling pitcher. Tickets tip the scales at over $3,000 a seat as out-of-town fans will flock, for what they think might possibly be their last time, to see Fenway in person.

Today, Fenway will host four infrequent guests in Harvard (21–13), Northeastern (17–13), Boston College (17–18) and Massachusetts (21–12). Twice a year in April the college kids come out to a virtually empty park (it is not a stadium by '90's standards), where the sparse fans can sit in any of the 33,871 seats available. Parents take the day off to see their boy take one at-bat, and with one swing, maybe knock a longball over the wall or deep into the center field triangle, which stumps visiting outfielders every time. It is an art passed down, how to actually play the wall, that is.

For the past 10 years, the Beanpot has attempted to emulate its more famous big brother, the collegiate hockey tournament. The Minutemen were able to nab the slot when Boston University shut down its baseball program. This will be the fourth time the Minutemen have participated, much to the chagrin of the other teams. UMass is the two-time reigning champion (last year the championship was never played due to rain).

The Crimson and the Minutemen will tangle in the second game today at 2 p.m., as the Eagles and the Huskies

Water polo defends its Eastern crown

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

The UMass women's water polo team captured the Eastern Championships this past weekend.

By Adam White

They went in with the taste of humble pie still lingering in their mouths. But when it was over, they were left to savor the flavor of victory.

The members of the No. 14 Massachusetts women's water polo team rocketed back to the top of East Coast water polo this weekend by winning their second consecutive Collegiate Water Polo Association Eastern Championship.

Massachusetts downed Slippery Rock (12–5), Iona (14–2), and No. 11 Princeton (5–4) in round-robin play before closing out the tourney with wins over Harvard (6–5) and No. 13 Maryland (5–2).

"Last year, it was a little easier making it to the top," said junior co-captain Claudia Clement. "This time, it was a real test of who wanted it the most."

UMass came into Easterns with an unusual level of intensity, courtesy of late-season losses to the Tigers and Lady Terps at the ECAC Championships earlier this month. As the Minutewomen watched Princeton and Maryland slip past them in the national rankings, a competitive fire began brewing that could only be extinguished with another Eastern title.

"Without those losses, we wouldn't have known how close they were to us," Clement said. "It fired us up. There's a big difference between wanting to win and expecting to win."

UMass' drive was apparent from the tournament's onset. The Maroon and White offense fired on all cylinders against Slippery Rock, led by All–American Katie Grogan's six goals and two scores from Marci Hupp. Anne Dettloff, Jacqui Goodhue and Megan Perry also scored for UMass.

This game marked the return of freshman goalkeeper Dana Sinkwich, who was forced to sit out the entire month with a shoulder injury. The California native turned away 11 Slippery Rock shots in the tourney-opening win.

"Having Dana back was a real key for us," Hupp said. "Her play was simply amazing."

LaVallee named a four-time All–American

2000 Olympic Games now the focus for the Massachusetts gymnast

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

Closing out a long, exciting season, junior Jeff LaVallee of the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team, once again went down in UMass history, earning All–America honors an astonishing four times in the NCAA National Championships.

Last Thursday, LaVallee earned the sixth place spot in the all–around with a 57.425, entering him into the UMass Hall of Fame as being one of only three Minutemen in history to earn All–America honors. The Connecticut native is the first UMass gymnast in 25 years to receive this prestigious award — the first since Gene Whelan in 1974.

The junior qualified for the event finals on three events, the floor exercise, vault and still rings. He earned a season- high rating 9.70 on floor, a solid 9.675 on vault, and an impressive 9.75 on rings. He also muscled his way to a 9.60 on parallel bars, a 9.40 on high bar and a 9.30 on the pommel horse.

On the final day of competition, LaVallee earned an impressive three additional All–America honors, as he finished within the top six on each of his qualifying events. He finished fourth on floor exercise (9.70), fifth on rings (9.7125), and finished the meet earning the sixth place spot on vault (9.70).

"It was a really exciting meet," LaVallee said. "I was hitting my routines, but I was feeling kind of rough; it just wasn't my day. But feeling like that was good in a way, because I need to adjust to adversity for future meets."

Women's crew wrap up A–10s in winner's box

By Chris Spring
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's crew had struggled in its last two races, coming up with a couple of second–place finishes. All it needed to change that was a trip to Cooper River, Collingswood, N.J.

There, UMass won the Atlantic 10 women's rowing championship for the fourth straight year, making UMass the only school to win the event in its four–year existence.

Also coming up with a four–peat of his own was UMass coach Jim Dietz, who was honored as Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year for the fourth time running.

Dietz commented on the state of the conference when he said, "It seems like the other schools are catching up to us. The one thing with the point system is that every race we won, George Washington finished second. So if they had won a race that we hadn't entered, for instance, then that may have an effect on the overall outcome. If you have 11 equally strong schools, the scenario would be fine."

UMass finished with 49 points to head the overall team standings. It was followed by George Washington with 30 points, Fordham and St. Joseph's tied for third with 19 points and Dayton was fifth tallying 17 points. The remainder of the field included Temple, Duquesne, Rhode Island and La Salle, respectively. Virginia Tech and Xavier rounded out the bottom with each school failing to collect a single point.

The Minutewomen victories came in the varsity eight, the quad, the lightweight four, the second varsity eight, novice eight–A and novice eight–B.

"The one race we won that we wouldn't have won before was the lightweight four," commented Dietz. The victorious squad consisted of Monica Patel, Melissa Allen, Stephanie Kren, Renee' Domina and Andrea Spencer.

UMass placed second to the Rams in the varsity four final. The only other race the Minutewomen didn't win was the novice four final. They finished in fifth place with a time of 10:01.72. Duquesne won the race, marking the first ever win for the Dukes in the four–year history of the Atlantic 10 Championship.

Overall, Dietz was very pleased with his team's performance across the board starting with the varsity eight, with whom he had been expecting more. "I look at the spread between our varsity eight and our JV eight boats and compare their times to see if the varsity is getting faster. This is the first week there's really been a difference with the varsity boat finishing 13 seconds faster," he said.

UMass is back on the right track heading into an all–important match with Syracuse next weekend.

"If we can beat Syracuse in the three big races, the NCAA looks at [varsity eight, junior varsity eight and varsity four] it will be a big step. Syracuse is ranked second in the Mid–Atlantic region, and by beating them the NCAA may look to take three or four teams from New England, instead of just two," said Dietz.

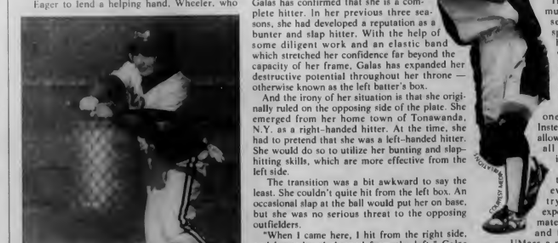
The band plays on for Mandy Galas

UMass lead-off batter fights to become a complete hitter

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Mandy Galas was looking for a little power.

She was hoping to complement her slender, 5-foot–5 frame.



Galas figured that since she's willing to offer senior softball wisdom to her freshman teammates at UMass, it wouldn't hurt to ask for a little something in return. And then the proverbial light bulb inside her head suddenly lit up. Why not ask for some power?

On April 15, when the Minutewomen hosted state–rival Harvard, the tiny second baseman approached her powerful, 5–foot–10 teammate Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler and made a request no less subtle than her size. Galas asked Wheeler, a freshman pure power hitter, if she would share some of her strength at the plate.

Eager to lend a helping hand, Wheeler, who had already doubled deep toward the left field fence, handed an ordinary tan rubber band to Galas. The small lead–off hitter wrapped the band around her wrist and the secret to hitting success was thus revealed... and then duplicated.

"Scooter was wearing it, and I asked her for a little bit of her power, and she got me one," Galas said.

No sooner had Galas put on the elastic band did she step to the plate and smack a Harvard pitch into left field for an RBI single. It would be one of two powerful hits for Galas in the game, the other of which was a triple.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Mandy Galas has been a force for the Massachusetts softball team for four years.

From that moment onward, Galas has confirmed that she is a complete hitter. In her previous three seasons, she had developed a reputation as a bunter and slap hitter. With the help of some diligent work and an elastic band which stretched her confidence far beyond the capacity of her frame, Galas has expanded her destructive potential throughout her throne — otherwise known as the left batter's box.

And the irony of her situation is that she originally ruled on the opposing side of the plate. She emerged from her home town of Tonawanda, N.Y. as a right–handed hitter. At the time, she had to pretend that she was a left–handed hitter. She would do so to utilize her bunting and slap–hitting skills, which are more effective from the left side.

The transition was a bit awkward to say the least. She couldn't quite hit from the left box. An occasional slap at the ball would put her on base, but she was no serious threat to the opposing outfielders.

"When I came here, I hit from the right side, and bunted and slapped from the left," Galas said. "In order to give myself a [better] chance, I started hitting from the left side."

But she got better — much better — quickly. She improved faster than her opponents expected. By her sophomore season, she had perfected her bunting and slapping technique enough to boast a .317 batting average, and a .436 mark within the Atlantic 10 Conference.

When her junior year rolled around she began to hit well — 35.4 percent of the time to be exact. She had successfully transferred her ability to hit from the right side over to the left. With that accomplished, Galas approached Wheeler for the final ingredient. And now that she's added it to her hitting recipe, Galas has left her opposition utterly confused.

"Everyone still thinks I'm a bunter and slapper, and I have the advantage when they're playing far up," she said.

Last season she seldom showed signs of her capability to hit for power. Admittedly, Galas would swing for the fences during batting practice, but not with great success.

"I think last year I hit two foul ball [home runs] out of [Totman Field] in practice," she said.

The band, however, has played a much different tune for her this season. It's been a magical spring for Galas. She's already hit two home runs, one of which was a game– winning solo blast that cleared the fence at St. Joseph's. The other came earlier in the season against Marshall. It was more typical of the type of long ball one would expect from Galas. Instead of power, it was speed that allowed the lead– off hitter to touch all four bases during an inside–the–park home run.

And now that she's encountered and conquered just about every facet of hitting, Galas is trying to bestow some of her experience upon her younger teammates, namely the seven freshmen and four sophomores that make UMass a predominantly underclassman team. She's also hoping that her 34–8 Minutewomen qualify for the NCAA Women's College World Series for the third consecutive season.

"It's kind of nice because I think that I have a lot to offer them [like] experience and playing knowledge," said Galas of her predominantly

Walk checks out campus safety

By Andrea Crane
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 30 people, including University of Massachusetts Police Chief, John Luippold, members of the vice chancellor's Summit on Safety Committee and interested students, gathered in front of the Student Union last night to re–assess the safety of the UMass campus.

As part of the third annual Safety Walk, the group branched off into five subgroups, each of which surveyed a portion of the campus. The groups evaluated sites on campus based on lighting, availability of call–boxes, condition of paths and landscape safety. After assessing each area, the evaluations will be put into a report which outlines the necessary improvements.

According to Graeme Sephton, a representative from the Office of Information Technology, "Each year OIT has a budget of $30,000 in order to install new call boxes across campus."

With each call box costing approximately $10,000, only three new call boxes will be added to the UMass campus this year. OIT provides the money to make these improvements and UMass Public Safety installs the boxes.

This year they have plans to put in a new call box at Wilder Hall which is the site of the Everywoman's Center. The placement of the other two boxes is still under consideration.

Jeff Howe, Student Government Association president suggested that a call box be installed in the Purple Lot behind the Orchard Hill Residential Area where there is constant student traffic.

When lighting problems are discovered on campus, a report is given to the Physical Plant to make the necessary improvements. The most recent major project done by the Physical Plant was the lighting of the path from Sylvan to the Purple lot. Although this area is not very long, the cost of the work totaled $89,000.

There has been much concern in the past that lights should be installed in the path running from Sylvan to Orchard Hill, however there are no electrical outlets available in order to make this possible. According to Earl Smith, director of the Physical Plant, "You don't want to take such an underdeveloped area as this and begin to make improvements because more problems will be found and the process would be neverending." Earl also said that they are not usually able to focus on one major project because of the lack of funding.

"It is all about priorities," he said, "things that we can do that are reasonably priced we will fix right away, otherwise we have to wait for funding."

All of the money for improvements is taken directly out of the Physical Plant budget and those problems that cannot be attended to quickly will be put on a project list until the proper funds are available.

A report illustrating all the problem areas on campus will be presented at the Safety Summit Committee meeting on May 14, 1999.

Overall, the walk was deemed successful by both students and administrators. Jeff Welch, a senator representing Orchard Hill at large said "I was really surprised at how responsive everyone [the staff and administrators who participated] was." It was the first Safety Walk that he had been on and he thought that it went very well. Chief of Police, John Luippold also was impressed with the event. "I was very pleased with the attendance. It was a great opportunity to be working together with students and to see the campus at night."

On the walk following the Orchard Hill/Central route, Earl Smith pointed "we need to establish one safe way for students to get from the Purple Lot down to the Orchard Hill and Central living areas." Earl suggested building a stone pathway down the hill.

Surveys show satisfaction with campus for majority, however not for minority

By Jake Lilen
Collegian Staff

A new study reveals that while most University of Massachusetts students are satisfied with academic and campus life, there is a large disparity in the level of contentment among students of different races.

The study, released by Student Affairs Research, Information and Systems (SARIS), shows students giving positive marks to most aspects of the "UMass experience."

Over 80 percent of students surveyed were "very or somewhat satisfied" with their academic experience and progress, as well as campus security, and the services of the Registrar's Office. A clear majority of the students also expressed satisfaction with the accessibility of the faculty, the Financial Aid Office and University Health Services.

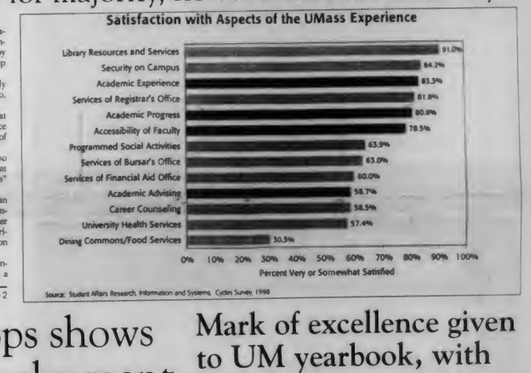
Student satisfaction was highest, however, with the services and resources of campus libraries, in which 91 percent of the students surveyed expressed approval.

The only aspect of campus life not endorsed by the majority of students was the University's Dining Commons and Food Services, which only 30.3 percent claimed to be satisfied.

While most of the figures seem high, many have decreased significantly since last year's SARIS survey. The percentage of students very or somewhat satisfied by their academic progress and their academic experience have both gone down by more than 5 percent since the previous year's survey.

Gary Malaney, director of SARIS, says a possible explanation for this decline is that while the current survey was conducted by mail, the previous year's survey was conducted by telephone, which could potentially have altered the makeup of participating students.

The study also shows that white students are generally much happier with campus life than ALANA (Asian, Latino, African, Native American) students.



While 61.9 percent of white students surveyed said that they would recommend UMass to other students of their race or ethnicity, only 29.9 percent of Asian and 34.6 percent of black students would do the same.

The study showed that black and Asian students were also much more likely to be dissatisfied with their social life at UMass, and to wish that they attended a more "prestigious" institution.

Hispanic students seemed to be significantly happier than black or Asian students. 51.9 percent said they would recommend UMass to other students of their race, and gave higher ratings to virtually all other aspects of their UMass experiences, as well. Nonetheless, their overall level of satisfaction was still lower than that of white students.

Malaney tried to explain the discrepancies between the contentment rates of white students and students of color in a

Task Force has eyes on Boston

The students of the Task Force for Equal Opportunity and Access at the University of Massachusetts have decided to take their dissatisfaction with the revised admission policy up with the Board of Higher Education.

Today at 10 a.m. buses will leave from the Hagis Mall to go to Boston. The march will start at noon on Park Street and end up at Beacon Street where President William Bulger's office is.

"We'll stop periodically and then we will proceed past the Statehouse and be on to the Board of Ed which will be our final destination," said Monica Chierici, a sophmore social thought political economy (STPEC) major, and a organizer of the march.

"We've contacted schools statewide and we're hoping that all students will show up. We especially want to reach high school students because this has an impact on their future," said Chierici.

One of the main problems according to Cori Daddabbo, a freshman undecided major who will be participating in today's protest on Boston, is that everyone is not afforded the same opportunities in high school.

"In 1995 the Board of Higher Ed planned to raise admissions standards for students to get here. Using a weighted GPA is unfair, some schools don't have honor courses, especially in the inner cities where minorities live," said Daddabbo.

The buses will return back to the Hagis Mall around 6:00 p.m. tomorrow night.

Call for more troops shows deepening U.S.involvement

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon announced yesterday it will call 33,102 reservists to active military duty, bringing the Kosovo conflict close to communities from coast to coast. The call-up will begin immediately with 2,116 members of the Air Force Reserve and Air National Guard to assist in aerial refueling of NATO warplanes. The first reservists to get the call are from units based in Alabama, Arizona, California, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. They will serve on active duty for as long as six months.

Thousands more reservists will be pulled from their civilian jobs in the weeks ahead as NATO expands its air campaign, Defense Secretary William Cohen said in announcing that his mobilization would affect reservists in all branches of the military.

The nonvoluntary call-up is the first since NATO began its air campaign to win autonomy for Kosovo on March 24 and the largest since 240,000 served in the buildup to the 1991 Gulf War. About 1,000 reservists have been serving as volunteers for NATO, but Cohen's call-up means they will be relieved.

"We must go beyond the limits of volunteerism," Air Force Maj. Gen. Michael Kudlacz told reporters.

The Pentagon did not have a precise breakdown of the 33,102 reservists to be called, by service. But it said about 25,000 will be Air Force, 6,100 Army, and 1,000 each from the Marine Corps and Navy.

Labor Secretary Alexis M. Herman publicly reminded employers that reservists' civilian jobs are protected by law, and Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said he would introduce legislation that would offer financial assistance to reservists who are small business owners and are included in the call-up for Kosovo duty.

In a related development, Air Force May. Gen. Susan Pamerleau said the Air Force has been authorized to prevent active duty members in certain job specialties from leaving the service during the Kosovo conflict. She said it had not been determined yet how many departures would be stopped or in which jobs, but it is the first time this "stop loss" authority has been used since the Gulf War, she said.

On the diplomatic front, Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott concluded talks in Moscow with Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov and Viktor Chernomyrdin, the Russian mediator for the Balkans. "On behalf of the United States, he laid out very clearly the objectives NATO has set forth in its communiques and the importance we attach to achieving those objectives," State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said.

Russia strongly objects to NATO's bombing campaign and to the idea of a NATO-led peacekeeping force being sent to Kosovo in the event of a settlement to ensure safe return of refugees.

"The Russians did not indicate any major changes in their position," Rubin said.

In remarks at a Pentagon news conference. Cohen indicated little interest in the idea of putting a peacekeeping force under the command of the United Nations — a formulation that might be acceptable to Yugoslavia but at any rate is on hold as long as NATO keeps up its bombing campaign.

"There must be an international peacekeeping force that is NATO-led, at the core, NATO must be involved in its management," Cohen said. He seemed to leave room for maneuver, however, by adding later that "we believe it should be led by NATO."

White House press secretary Joe Lockhart used a similar approach, saying the force "would be one with NATO at its core." Yugoslavia has insisted that it not include any NATO countries. Administration officials were encouraged that representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross had a second, more substantive visit with the three U.S. soldiers being held as prisoners of war in Belgrade. The three were examined by a doctor but the results were not made public.

Despite discouragement from the White House, a delegation of U.S. religious leaders led by Jesse Jackson said it will travel to Yugoslavia today to meet with three captive Americans and try to secure their freedom.

Mark of excellence given to UM yearbook, with need for future support

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' 1999 Index yearbook has beat out over 4,000 yearbooks this year winning the Gallery of Excellence award from the Walsworth Publishing Company.

"It was chosen due to the staffs integrated incorporation of the old and new, in telling the end of the century story of UMass Amherst through its students experiences," said David M. Roth, Walsworth Publishing yearbook specalist.

Roth continued to praise the UMass yearbook saying - "The theme, 'Seven Generations' traces the rich history of UMass utilizing current and prior university seals, quotes from current students and alumni as well as new and archive photography] explanatory endsheets and creative coverage in this book makes me feel as if I am on the campus on the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and equips me with an understanding of the rich history of this fine institution. We are proud to be the publishers of this fine publication."

Representatives of the yearbook were presented with a plaque commemorating this accomplishment at the official Gallery of Excellence Awards Luncheon.

The 1999 Index will be displayed nationally upon final publication at the national journalism and student press conventions through 2000. UMass students can buy yearbooks for $50 through Walsworth.

physically.

"I've been around so long since 1869, I can't believe the University would let it die. This could be the last yearbook," said Gagnon.

"It is amazing what they are able to do with such a small staff," said Roth. According to Gagnon, the staff isn't paid and that makes it hard to keep a staff. In an effort to sustain the yearbook, Gagonon is trying to develop a class that will teach yearbook design and hopefully attract a staff. According to Gagnon the editor-in-chief Yuonne Yang has worked incredibly hard on this year's Index.

Walsworth President and C.E.O. Donald Walsworth said "The cover [utilizing a montage of current and archive photographs] explanatory endsheets and creative coverage in this book makes me feel as if I am on the campus on the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and equips me with an understanding of the rich history of this fine institution. We are proud to be the publishers of this fine publication."

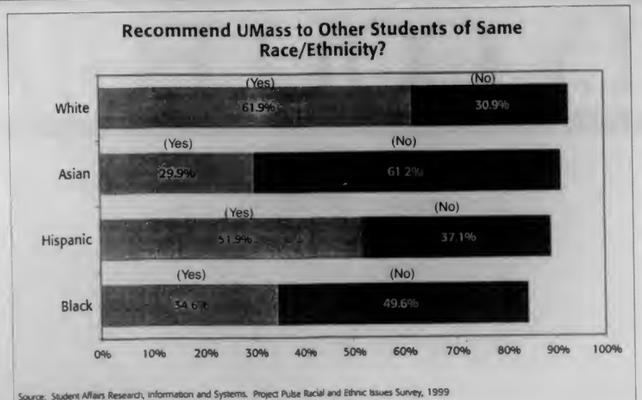
report entitled "Student Satisfaction With Campus Services: Comparisons Among Racial/Ethnic Groups."

"Simply by virtue of their smaller numbers, students of color at [predominantly white college campuses] ... find it more difficult to meet people with similar backgrounds and interests and thus often encounter social isolation in addition to problems related to cultural adjustment," Malaney wrote.



When the study was presented at last Thursday's meeting of the Faculty Senate, several professors were skeptical of the categories used.

"It is not obvious to me that the best way to sort people is by race," said Psychology Professor Richard Bogartz. "I'm sure you can find differences if you sort people by race, but it... may be possible that people are having negative experiences because of other [factors]."

"I agree completely," said Malaney.

"I should just note that we were asked by staff of color in Student Affairs to do some sorting by race, so that's why we did this," Malaney continued. "Granted, there are all kinds of clusters that you go through and see what kinds of experiences come out."

Economics Professor Robert Costrell questioned the very basis of the study.

Profit, issue of lecture

Visiting Scholar Professor Burton Weisbrod will be giving a lecture tomorrow afternoon in Thompson Hall entitled, "To Profit or Not to Profit: Why the Nonprofit Sector is Growing So Fast and Should Anyone Care?"

In the lecture, he will address the questions: Why is the nonprofit sector growing so rapidly? Does it deserve the subsidies and tax exemptions it receives? Do nonprofit organizations really act differently from private firms? Why are for-profit firms converting to nonprofit, and nonprofits converting to for-profits? How solid are the barriers between nonprofit organizations and private firms?

Professor Weisbrod is the John Evans Professor of Economics at Northeastern University and is a Faculty Fellow at Northwestern's Institute for Policy Research, of which he was Director from 1990-1995.

In 1997 he received the Lifetime Achievement Award of ARNOVA (the Association for Research on Nonprofit Organizations and Voluntary Associations). He is the author of The Nonprofit Economy, and was elected as a Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science and this year is a Phi Beta Kappa Visiting Scholar.

The lecture is part of the Center for Public Policy and Administration's Distinguished Lecture Series. It will take place tomorrow at 4 p.m. in room 620 Thompson Hall. The lecture is free and open to the public with a small reception to follow.

Collegian Coorespondent

Colleen Stone is a junior journalism major and history minor who sometimes wakes up at three a.m. to save lives.

Her big red pager is more like a walkie-talkie than a beeper that keeps her on call 24-hours a day. She hears the words "Attention all Amherst units, respond to box alarm..." and before she can respond, she is on her way to the fire station.

Stone works at the North Station in Amherst which is comprised entirely of student volunteers. This year, they have 13 students, which is a sharp decrease from the 20 they had last year. This places more demands on student volunteers during night shifts from 11:45 p.m. to 8 a.m. as there are four students per night shift.

During the last week of summer before classes, Wonder Week, Stone experienced a 40-hour intensive training over a five day period. Stone says that it is "like the Massachusetts Fire Academy, but in less time."

Stone lost weight during the grueling August training, but her gains became valuable first lessons about firefighting. She admits the she initially got involved as a "spur of the moment kind of thing" but she has always been a bit of a daredevil.

Stone is not the sole woman volunteer, but she feels that she tried extra hard at first to keep up to speed with everyone else. Trust is an important component to firefighting and she wanted to be sure she could carry her own weight and perhaps her partner's if something went wrong. She expected some degree of sexism, but everyone is "cool and accepting and gives an equal shake," which she doubts she'll find anywhere else.

Stone is excited to work this summer for the Amherst Permanent Force and live next year in the North Station. She says it will be like a dorm but it will be different to sleep over an ambulance and firetruck below. Newly certified as an Emergency Medical Technician (EMT), her duties will also expand.

For her primary career, Stone is hoping to become an independent writer and create a schedule that could accommodate firefighting. She says many students continue firefighting after college and one student from the North Station is a full-time candidate for the Amherst Permanent Force.

A huge lesson Stone learned from volunteer work is the art of time management. Every week she balances an 18 credit course-load, three hours of drill training, eight hours of volunteering on the weekend, and a six-hour pump course to learn about water pressure, gallons-per-minute, and the streets of Amherst. She claims that she knows these streets better than her own hometown.

Stone feels people volunteer for firefighting because they want to commit the time. She believes that they all "give back to people and hopefully are a positive force."

Stone is glad that this has been a slow year and little has happened, but she wants to be involved in a good way. Most of all, Stone joined the firefighters to get more out of her college career and she encourages others, especially women, to educate themselves outside of the classroom and join the North Station volunteers.

Colleen Stone is a student volunteer firefighter for Amherst's North Station.

Chernobyl virus strikes hard

By Chris Allbritton
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Proving more destructive than expected, the Chernobyl virus caused hundreds of thousands of computer meltdowns around the world, though the effects were far worse overseas than in the United States.

The unusually destructive virus — timed to strike on April 26, the 13th anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster — tries to erase a computer's hard drive and write gibberish into its system settings to prevent the machine from being restarted.

While experts were still tallying numbers, Turkey and South Korea each reported 300,000 computers damaged Monday, and there were more elsewhere in Asia and the Middle East. Officials said warnings there weren't heeded.

"Arguably, this is the most malicious computer virus," said Dan Schrader, director of product marketing at Trend Micro Inc., which manufactures antivirus software.

Other experts disagreed over whether it was the most destructive virus ever. But many were caught off guard by the amount of damage and said it was much worse than the Melissa virus early this month. Before Chernobyl hit, several experts were quoted as saying they didn't expect it to cause much trouble.

The United States suffered far less than other nations, and experts credited widespread warnings and updated antivirus programs with helping avert problems in the corporate world. Home users were hit harder.

About 100 student computers were wiped out at Princeton University about two weeks before term papers were due.

"The computers were affected to a point where the hard drives were rendered useless," Princeton spokesman Justin Harmon said yesterday.

At Boston College, the virus affected only those students who did not install antivirus software distributed by the university last fall, spokesman Jack Dunn said.

Bill Pollak, spokesman for the Computer Emergency Response Team at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, said there were reports of at least 2,328 computers damaged in the United States. But the numbers could be higher, since no company or computer user is required to report a virus attack, he said.

The virus is believed to have originated in Taiwan and attacks Windows 95 and Windows 98 computers. The virus is spread by running an infected program on a computer. Any outside program could potentially be infected.

"Turkey was caught unprepared," said Mustafa Ucoklar, an electronics engineer in Turkey, where the virus infected computers at banks, an airport and state-run radio and TV stations, according to Turkey's Radikal newspaper. "The warnings were there, but nobody took any notice of them."

South Korean officials also reported about 300,000 computers were hit in government offices, schools and businesses — about four percent of the nation's computers — in the worst attack of its kind in the country.

Girlfriend of high school shooter bought gun

LITTLETON, Colo. (AP) — Investigators said yesterday that Dylan Klebold's 18-year-old girlfriend bought at least two of the guns used in the bloodbath at Columbine High School, and they want to know if she knew what he had planned.

Columbine senior Robyn K. Anderson was interviewed by investigators, released without charges being filed and has retained a lawyer, said Steve Davis, a spokesman for the Jefferson County sheriff's office. The weapons were purchased at a Denver area gun show last fall.

Investigators have not called Miss Anderson a suspect but Jefferson County Sheriff John Stone told the Denver Rocky Mountain News it was conceivable she knew what Klebold and classmate Eric Harris had intended to do with the weapons.

"She's not going to use those for pheasant hunting," he told the newspaper.

Davis said he didn't know where Miss Anderson was on April 20, the day Klebold and Harris killed 12 students, a teacher and themselves. The boys carried four guns. Investigators traced a semiautomatic TEC DC-9 pistol and a rifle to Miss Anderson, whom authorities described as a witness, not a suspect.

"As far as I know, she's still cooperative," said Sgt. Jim Parr, of the sheriff's office.

An 18-year-old person can buy a rifle according to federal law, but cannot legally buy a pistol from a federally licensed gun dealer. However, in Colorado, an 18-year-old person can buy a handgun in a private sale, such as from a seller at a gun show. Klebold was 17 and Harris turned 18 earlier this month. Miss Anderson was 18 in November.

Even if Miss Anderson bought the guns legally, she still could face serious consequences.

"There's a rainbow of charges there," Davis said, ranging from supplying a weapon to a juvenile to 13 separate homicides, depending on whether she or anyone else knew why they were buying the guns or how they would be used.

Satellite disappears after launch

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A civilian satellite that can take the kind of detailed photos that previously only spy satellites could produce disappeared shortly after it was launched yesterday. An Athena II rocket carrying the Ikonos 1 satellite roared off a Vandenberg Air Force Base launch pad at 11:22 a.m., bound for an orbit 400 miles high.

Communications with the spacecraft ended about eight minutes after liftoff, as planned, but it failed to re-establish contact as expected later in the flight. Officials could not say whether it remained in orbit.

Space Imaging, the Denver company that planned to operate the satellite, has already built a spare Ikonos.

Ikonos 1, named after the Greek word for "image," has a camera capable of resolving objects one meter square — about 10 square feet. That means the satellite would be able to distinguish between a car and truck, according to Space Imaging.

Until now, only military satellites have been able to photograph Earth in such detail. Some experts said they worried that images from Ikonos 1 could be used by terrorists or enemy governments to plan attacks or spot mobilizing troops.

The federal government approved the satellite in 1994. Space Imaging, a privately held company, said it expects its clients to use the images for urban planning, environmental monitoring, mapping, assessing the scope of natural disasters, oil and gas exploration, monitoring farmland and planning communication networks.

John Pike, an authority on space reconnaissance with the private Federation of American Scientists in Washington, D.C., pointed out that the government will not allow images of some places to be sold.

"The dilemma that you've got, though, is how do you make sure that Serbia doesn't know where American troops are while making sure that American news media is able to cover the war," Pike said. "And we're obviously going to have a hard time drawing that line."

The proud employee

I'm a working girl. Ever since I was 16 I've been paying FICA taxes and donning a name tag. Never being one for classes in high school (oh UMass, you must have appreciated the penmanship in my application), I belonged to a plethora of clubs with no purposes (I just remember selling lollipops and putting up streamers).

Julie Fialkow

I took pottery classes and worked at McMinimum wage.

You know what's coming, don't you? I'm gonna start talking about how this relates to being a senior and not having a job and blobbedy blah blah. But that theme in my life is as played out as a sweater from Abercrombie & Fitch. So instead, I am going to take you on a magical mystery tour through the bowels of my adolescent working hell.

First off, I am a slave to the smells of food–court Chinese food and fake leather. I have worked at every mall in the South Jersey regional area in addition to a large outlet mall in Philadelphia. And my stay in the great Pioneer Valley would not be proper, without of course, a miserable job selling overpriced plate sets at the Holyoke Mall last summer.

My first stint was at the Gap. If you think the Gap has nice clothes, I can say, "Yeah, alright." If you say the Gap is not really a free therapy session for rich, insecure, doctors' wives, I'd stop ya dead in your tracks.

"These pants make my hips look huge. I just had a baby [seven years ago] and I'm retaining water [all I drink is water]. What do you think?"

"Oh my gosh! I've never seen someone look so great in a pair of $80 khakis! Actually, are those a size four, because you look like you have some extra room in the caboose. Let me bring you a size two!"

Then, I'd go in the back and make fun of the customer to the shipping guys. Then I'd turn right back around to the dressing room and hand her a pair of size two khakis and a belt to match.

"As slim as you are, you'll need a belt to hold those up!"

I'd get the sale and I was on my way to being employee of the day. There is no glory like the glory of earning yourself a Gap water bottle.

Then I worked at a different mall, one where fat men wear mesh shirts and say, "Yougeuys," and ladies view Mrs. Roper as a fashion inspiration — a mall that exemplifies all the stereotypes of malls. Okay, a mall so small that I knew all the weenie security guys' names. I knew that the guy working the Hunan Delight rubbed his bare feet in the hallway with one hand, and smoked a Marlboro in the other.

I worked at Auntie Anne's pretzels for four days. I quit because I hated smelling like melted butter no matter how often I showered and 'cause I don't like when people are mean to me. People who get angry because you didn't put enough salt nuts on their pretzel (yup, that is inherently wrong) are generally mean people.

Okay, so I am a glutton for punishment and I worked at County Seat the leanstore for a longer time than I will admit in print. For those of you that don't know, this store specialized in country clothes for people who didn't live in the country. For people who live in New Jersey but get it confused with Arkansas.

This was actually a really fun place to work because no one ever went there. I got paid to stand around and count ceiling tiles and ugly people. Sixty ceiling tiles and approximately 537 ugly people. My name tag also said, "Jules" and strangers said, "Jules, can I get a 34/32 in these Levi's? Thanks. Jules." I just got a kick out of it.

By far, the worst, most shameful career I held was selling talking t-shirts in one of those little carts in malls. Yes, you heard me — t-shirts: soft, 100 percent cotton with funny designs, but these dang shirts spoke to you. There was a Beavis and Butthead t-shirt that sang out, "Huh, huh. This sucks." when you touched it. There were computer chips in the ink or something that activated it. Also, a wolf that howled. Thank God people invent crap like this instead of curing cancer.

But here's the kicker. I had to wear one with drums. The drums were on my chest. So you can only imagine the onslaught of charming commenis I received. Humiliation humbles the soul; but in my case it just made me feel icky.

Why did I do it? I will do a lot of things for $10 an hour. If there was crack in the t–shirts, I'd sell them to my grandma for that kind of money.

But there are more reasons why this sucked a whole lot. I had to stand around and play with all the t–shirts. Touching them and making people say, "Holy Moses! Those t–shirts talk! Sears can wait!"

So to make things short and to the point, the people that worked at Cinnabon across the way grew tired of constantly hearing wolves howling, drums beating and Beavis and Butthead's crazy shenanigans.

"That's really annoying," a skanky Cinnabon employee said to me. "Could you stop making those things make noise?"

"Umm, I can't. I get paid to... I'm sorry, I know it's annoying." I wimpily responded.

And at that I got slapped with the b–word. And I'm not talking about Brainy or Beautiful.

He called me a bitch and walked away to his smelly cinnamon bun shack leaving me stripped of my dignity. Yeah, I was the t–shirt bitch and all I could do about it was play the drums on myself — and cry.

The moral of the story is I'm a suckah. You know what else? I know the value of a buck and the difference between easy and relaxed fit jeans. And where does that get me in life? A seat in life right next to the guy who serves up Chinese food with the same hand he uses to rub his dirty feet.

An overreactive America

Turn on any nightly news program these tragic days, and a barrage of new information about the Columbine High School massacre will be delivered to you, laced with state–of–the–art graphics, detailed images, video tapes, 911 calls and personal interviews.

No doubt, Ted Koppel or Jane Pauley will be comparing the killing of 15 students in Colorado to the seven other school shootings we've had since 1998. They'll have equally detailed descriptions of the weapons used, the diary one of the murderers kept, and the organized, long–in–the–making plans to blow up the entire school.

Cut to a commercial. Immediately after, a 17–year–old boy could just as easily witness an ad for the latest violent video game or movie, laced with state–of–the–art graphics, detailed images and realistic video clips. No doubt, the announcer will compare the game or movie to the seven other action games or movies we've had since 1998. He'll have equally detailed descriptions of the weapons used and the organized, long–in–the–making plans of the game/movie's vengeful protagonist.

Have "art" and life fused so completely that the TV– devouring 17–year–old can hardly tell the difference anymore?

This tired, enough–already question is just one of the questions among a zillion questions being asked by the very suspects themselves, the media, these tragic, questioning days. No one can escape this tragedy, but then again, does anyone want to? It seems that in the '90's, even after the lessons of O.J. and Monica, people can't stop asking the question "why?" even if the there is no explainable answer.

It's sadly obvious that we care more about the killers than the victims. Have we ever figured out what drives murderers to murder, and will we ever? We're fascinated by dehumanization, that drive of the madman to kill others and himself. It's a sadistic, ironically inhuman characteristic which will never go away, and is getting much worse.

It's the reason, after all, why we like such violent and revenge–packed movies, music and video games. Fueling the big debate about whether pop–culture violence causes real violence (reignited, ironically, by Bob Dole a few years ago), Bill Clinton recently issued a statement saying, "To the media and entertainment industries, I say just this: You know you have enormous power to educate and entertain our children... yes, there should be a label on the outside of every video, but what counts is what's on the inside and what it will do to the insides of our young people."

Ooh, that's clever, Bill. I can't wait to see the day when Clinton leaves the office and moves to Hollywood, as he's rumored to do. And if he makes an action movie? Pure bliss of American hypocracy. It's so easy for Clinton to just issue that statement and create some noise about some new, ineffective gun bill, and not think twice about it.

The same hypocracy applies to the question of whether or not the media influences violence. We're tired of the question, first because it has no easy answer, and second, because we all know that we love those movies just as much as the next person. We all state the fact that millions have seen these movies and not committed any violent acts.

Certain entertainment companies are taking no such risks, though, and for good reason. Metro–Goldywn–Mayer, in an unprecedented move, wants to pull all the video copies of their 1995 film The Basketball Diaries off the shelves, due to a dream sequence in the movie which has Leonardo DiCaprio shooting a teacher and some students in a long, dark trenchcoat.

Bryan McAllister

Similar instances have followed. The WB has pulled an episode of "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" that deals with a school massacre. CBS yanked an episode of "The Promised Land" that involves gang violence, even though CBS admits that no one has ever watched "The Promised Land." And nothing is bigger in pop–culture these days than The Matrix, which features Keanu Reeves in a trenchcoat, wielding guns and revenge plans. Of course, The Matrix is making too much money to ever be considered too dangerous for kids.

Again, this is not a new question. I can remember a couple of years ago when "Beavis and Butthead" was blamed for a house fire; when the movie The Program was blamed for deaths, and when Marilyn Manson was blamed for everything. When something tragic happens, only then do people look for an answer. They're too lazy and self– involved to look beforehand. Case in point: this trenchcoat business... Just because the shooters belonged to a band of outsiders known as the Trenchcoat Mafia, now everything that involves a trenchcoat is considered dangerous and evil. "Oh, it was those trenchcoats!" parents scream. It's the same thing as "Oh, it was that movie!" C'mon, wake up.

The fact is that this question, this "big debate," is probably even older than it seems. The fact is that books were influencing behavior way before today; Machiavelli's The Prince for instance, or works by Dostoyevsky and Edgar Allan Poe, among others. Their violence and madness was different, however; it was more psychological than random and aesthetic.

Yes, I do think that the violent aspect of today's movies and video games and their reliance on revenge influences a young kid's mind; but we should be looking at the kids' minds, not blaming the product. Movies are not any more responsible than the gun laying around in daddy's top drawer, or the blueprints to build a bomb easily found on the Internet.

Or life itself. Since the Columbine tragedy, incidents of bomb scares and massacre threats have surfaced throughout the country. It's sad to think that any kid would watch this tragedy, think to himself, "I know how they felt," and go out and try to top them. But imitation and idolization of real life people wasn't new to the Columbine killers, either. They worshipped Adolf Hitler, not Keanu Reeves.

Someone to blame

Do yourself a favor and write for Ed/Op!

The murder/suicides that took place in the Littleton, Colo. high school force this country to look for possible causes. This is true more so for this high school killing incident than for any of the previous ones, mainly because of the seemingly highly organized approach the attackers took. Moreover, the sheer amount of tragic deaths and injuries by far outnumbers the previous killings, suggesting things may be getting worse, not better.

Many Americans have pointed to the parents for allowing their children to become like this or to have access to the guns. There are even possible charges the state wants to levy against these parents in attempt to blame someone. Many so-called experts believe the entertainment industry itself may have helped cause the massacre. They say the industry has allowed such video games as "Doom" and music such as Marilyn Manson's to exist in this country, have they not?

Whatever it is, psychologists, law enforcement agents, politicians, or average citizens suggest, it seems they all want to blame a specific group or industry for the killings. However, not once have I seen an interview with has blamed American culture itself, thus blaming everyone in this country, for the murder/suicides.

I usually try not to base my argument on a personal basis, but in order to understand my feelings on the high school murder/suicides, I must disclose my opinions and takes on my high school and grade school experiences. No, they certainly were not equivalent to those involved, for no two people experience the same life, but it seems to me some of their feelings were not too different from mine during many of my years in grade school.

Though I had a small, but stable group of friends, I certainly never would have considered myself popular, even within that group. My very small high school allowed everyone to know each other, and while this was great for classroom attention, it works against those who are not popular, for everyone knew who was "in" and who was not.

Throughout my years in school, beginning from as early as I can recall, I was mocked with what some consider petty school–kid taunts. But, being mocked for such ridiculous things as the color of my hair and having grades that were too good for most, my self–esteem and respect for those of my school certainly was never high.

Later on, once I reached high school, the so–called meaningless taunts finally affected my once exceptional grades, and I was struggling against my self–esteem to get in the 90s at all in the ninth grade. I can remember all too well that year fearing yet another remark from the popular groups each time I walked in the halls or sat near them in a class.

By the time I was a senior, my self–esteem had somewhat returned, though, out of thoughts of finally leaving those hated students behind forever, college, and a stable romantic relationship. It happens that the two students in Littleton were said to have lacked all three of these, which to me shows just how close I or my friends could have been.

Jason Wiesenbach

Now, this may not seem like the most difficult experience in school, but one cannot be objective and place an experience on a continuum. Like beauty is determined by the beholder, so is one's feelings about life in school determined by what is experienced.

Remembering back to the worst of the years, ninth grade, I can specifically remember developing such a hatred against one or two students. I had several fantasies, and even a few dreams, in which I used the same method the Colorado students used, to finally rid myself of those that had taunted me for so many years.

As I have learned now, a few of my friends felt the same way about these students.

The problem I faced and so many other ridiculed students face is that we believe that not being liked in high school means you never will be liked. To blame such things as violent music as the cause of such insecurities or creating thoughts of killing is completely incorrect. I listened to music pertaining to death, like Slayer or Megadeth, but did it because I identified with the lyrics, as if they were a support group for me. And, no, I did not have problems at home, and instead had a very supportive upbringing.

I feel the problem is not just inherent in the grade schools, but exists within American culture. If you look at it as a structure, you will see a government and an economic system all based around power. I feel this, combined with other power differences like sexism and racism, creates a need for students to dominate other students, even if it is by such base means as taunting.

I do not feel that adding more security will stop killings or hatred against students in schools nor do I feel that banning gothic or rebellious clothing as has been done in Portsmouth, N.H., will. Each of those solutions still allows the power dynamic to breed. Perhaps a stable family can help, but as shown in my case, I do not feel it is the solution either. Parents alone cannot stop the inequalities in schools.

Until America stops basing its government and economic systems on hierarchical forms, I feel that students will still have power dynamics. Schools reflect the systems of the older generations, and until the adults reject power, inequality, and competition as bases for society, schools will never change, and I feel the killings will not stop. I feel the Colorado murder/suicides are not a fluke, but show that ridiculed students want society to know that something is inherently wrong in this culture.

Letters to the Editor

"Snide stereotypes" marked Wood's piece

To the editor:

In response to the article "I'll show you a protest" by Alexander Wood: get your facts straight. Try learning some of this information before you make a complete fool of yourself... oops, you already did. I would like to respond to each of your so–called "protests" and state the facts as they are; not as you so ignorantly see them.

So you have a problem with the food? How many more options do you want? I admit, the turkey dinner and some of the casseroles are sub–par, but go have a sandwich, cereal, salad, pizza, sub, waffle, soup or order out. Privatizing food services would likely make prices rise and put many hard– working, unionized adults out of a job that supports their families. Many private food service organizations will not employ students and are legally prohibited from hiring federal work–study students.

Second, the Textbook Annex is your friend, more than you will ever understand. They sell books at or slightly above factory cost, and offer to buy books back. The other Massachusetts state schools have privatized and gradually done away with the buyback program. That is a fact, my friend. Private companies sell for profit, not to help you out.

Aside from increased prices, privatization, by competing with student businesses, will damage the sense of community that I personally get where I work, a student business called Earthfoods. We have 28 members and serve over 400 people a day. Our average customer spends under three dollars to get full meal.

Regarding the Theater Department and their flyers — don't look at them! Is the Theater Department alone? Maybe you wouldn't know about Club Kali's "Girl's Night" without those posters. How else would you get a date?

You were right — your issues were not important. Ignorance is curable if you would bother to read a book, get involved in the community, attend a teach–in, listen to a protest or visit a student business. Knowledge definitely hurt you here and your snide stereotypes aided you in looking like a complete idiot. Mission accomplished, Alex.

Please think twice before you slice

We all have our daily rituals. Things we think about and do for obvious specific reasons everyday like brush our teeth or take a shower. We also do things unconsciously, without even thinking, such as always wearing our wallets in our left pockets or hitting the precious snooze button exactly four times before getting up. For over 80 percent of women one of these daily tasks involves putting a sharp, shiny object to their legs and arms to remove "unnecessary" hair, otherwise known as shaving. Whether this is the conscious thing to do, or one so imbedded in our heads it's just "natural," the fact remains that women, on the whole, do shave. The question I am asking is, why?

Adrien Hilton

I myself have never succumbed to this arbitrary custom of the female sex. Yes, that's right — I have virgin legs; never been shaved. Through various friends over the years I have learned, secondhand, the cost, time, effort, and pain involved with shaving oneself. How many countless times have I heard the lines, "I can't go swimming — my legs look like a forest," or "I won't be ready for awhile, I need to shave my legs," or "Look at this disgusting cut I got from shaving this morning." I haven't yet, in my 19 years of life, encountered a woman who actually enjoys shaving or rushes off to the bathroom to shave because it provides so much joy and pleasure.

So this is my consciousness raising effort to all of you shaving women out there. Next time you're in the shower ask yourself, "Why am I shaving my legs right now?" Think about who you're doing it for, who are you trying to impress?

Most of the time when confronted with these questions women provide simple answers. They like the feel of a freshly shaven leg or a hairy leg is itchy and uncomfortable. These are all fine and dandy, and show the woman's choice in the matter. But is it a choice? I think these answers don't address the real issue. The answer lies deeper and goes beyond look and feel. When 11–year–old girls are confronted by snickering girls and taunting boys, moms and magazines, TV and older sisters, does she really have the choice? Society forces this arbitrary ritual upon us at our most vulnerable age. Giving us the option of ridicule or razor. Now did you really choose? Think back to when you were 11 or 12. What messages did you receive? What compelled you to put that razor to your leg? What happened to the girls who didn't? I'm guessing most of you have similar stories. A story told to us as if we were a subservient class.

We do live in a sexist, male–dominated, patriarchal society. A society that pays women 70 cents to every dollar earned by men. A society that forces women to starve themselves in order to fit an ideal image for men. A society that tells us beauty and appearances are the number one priority. A society that forces a majority of us to shave our legs. It may seem simple, but shaving is just one of the symptoms of male domination over our bodies. Men like clean shaven bodies, it subconsciously reminds them of a little girl; a girl easily manipulated and controlled.

A hairy woman is often referred to by men as a "rude gust." A reference to power, wildness, and beastiality. Hair on a female is seen as a sign of overt sexual tendencies, and oh no we can't have that. We must be dainty, sheltered, subservient little creatures.

Shaving has deep–rooted cultural ties that go back as far as the early Egyptians. In this country the act of shaving started when in the '20s the sleeveless flapper dress became shorter and shorter, showing more and more leg. A hairy leg was an unattractive leg, a wild beast of a leg, an uncontrolled and untamed leg. As natural creatures of the human race, we have hair on our bodies in specific places for specific reasons. Hair is supposed to be on our legs; men don't spend countless hours getting rid of theirs. Why should we? We don't have to anymore!

Come join us in a celebration of female empowerment and reasserting control over our own bodies. Tonight, at 6 p.m., there will be a panel discussion on shaving and gender roles in the Colonial Lounge. At Queerfest, the Feminist Majority Leadership Alliance will be hosting a table for women to throw their razors away and play lots of fun games. So come on down and be wild, be crazy, be beautiful, be sexual, but do it without a razor in your hand!

Cape Cod women at cancer risk?

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

In Massachusetts, 11 of the 336 towns that are not on Cape Cod have a breast cancer incidence rate that is significantly higher than the state average. On Cape Cod, though, 6 of the 15 towns can lay claim to this sad distinction.

Dr. Julia Brody, the executive director of the Silent Spring Institute gave a speech in the Browsing Room of Smith College's Neilson Library last night that addressed this startling statistic. Brody's speech was sponsored by the Pioneer Valley Breast Cancer Network.

The Silent Spring Institute, according to its brochure, "is a partnership of scientists, physicians, public health advocates, and community activists united around the common goal of identifying — and changing — the links between environment and women's health." It takes its name from Rachel Carson's book, Silent Spring. "We tolerate cancer– causing agents in our environment at our peril," Carson wrote in her 1962 book.

Brody explained that the alarming rate of breast cancer on Cape Cod could not be explained. She said afterward that it's amazing "how little scientists know, after decades of research, about breast cancer." Brody also noted that the environmental factors of breast cancer have not been completely looked at.

But that's what the Institute is trying to change. Using a sophisticated mapping program called the Geographic Information System, the Institute is creating a database that keeps track of "land use, water supply and pesticides from the 1950s to the 1990s." It's innovative research methods like this that are allowing scientists and activists to look for clues to better prevent breast cancer.

—Their is one of the many talks Brody gives each year. Speaking on her frequent talks, Brody said it's "really very wonderful for me to meet women, and some men, all around the state who educate themselves about breast cancer."

The Institute is now working on interviewing female Cape Cod residents with and without breast cancer, as well as outlining a 40–year history of their past addresses. In addition, air and dust samples will be collected from 343 homes. "This coming year [there] will be very intensive data collection," Brody said.

Hey, compute this!

"Hello little lady!" says the man in the computer store, obviously mistaking you for a southern belle. "What's a pretty little thing like you doing in a big store like this?"

As a woman looking for a computer, there is a high probability that this is what you have in store. Or it could be worse. A friend of ours, who we'll call "Jessie," went with her dad to a store that specializes in computer sales. The salesman greeted her father, blatantly turning his back on Jessie. She tapped him on the shoulder and told him she was the one buying the computer and that her dad was only present to help her carry the computer to the car. He listened to her and then turned back to her father to continue discussing computers. Her father was equally as disturbed by the salesman's disregard for his daughter's presence.

Kara Stokes and Lisa Metcalf

Her father told him that Jessie had the checkbook, so if he wanted to make a sale, he had to talk to her. And did the salesman actually talk to her as an equal, someone capable of placing a computer order? Let's just say that Jessie was forced to take her order and her checkbook elsewhere simply because she is a woman.

Our personal experiences in purchasing computers are equally as alarming. The first scenario involves a computer I was ordering over the phone as a surprise for my father, who would be spending the next few months convalescing from heart surgery. Having bought myself a computer in the fall, I knew exactly what features I wanted. I specifically informed the salesman that the computer was a gift for my father and that it was a surprise. He acknowledged the information by including it in the sales notes on my order. Toward the end of our conversation, he asked for my father's name and phone number. I provided them, but not before reminding him not to call my father. He assured me that he only needed the information for his records and that he would not contact my father.

A few weeks passed, and the date when the computer would be ready approached. I was in my parents' kitchen and the phone rang. When I answered it, I heard a familiar voice ask for my father. I asked if this was Rich calling about the computer, and he said yes. I reminded him that it was a surprise and asked him if he was going to tell my father. He danced around the subject, saying that he was hoping I would answer the phone. And yet, he did ask for my father. The salesman saw two names on the order and chose the male name, even though a note on the order specifically told him not to contact the male. His choice came down to good old fashioned gender bias.

The second scenario involves an on–line ordering fiasco. I had spent countless hours researching exactly what I wanted. I read write–ups on what was good and what wasn't and finally found a computer I was satisfied with. I then found a place that said they could deliver it to me, at a reasonable price to boot. I ordered it on–line, and went through the usual e–mail and phone messages confirming that I really bought it.

When I called to check on the computer, they gave me the runaround, telling me the date of arrival was set–back. I called a few weeks later and they set the delivery date back even farther. In the time the computer was set back, the value of the computer depreciated and they tried to swindle me. They wanted to give me a store credit of ten dollars for a sixty dollar piece of hardware that they couldn't get to work. The only thing saving me was my own research on the system.

All three situations display the unfortunate fact that, although gender equality is a reality in much of contemporary society, a woman still can't buy a computer without being confronted with serious bias against them. So stick to your guns and know what you're looking for. A little research can take you a long way.

Women learn about health: cancer victim says being proactive is key issue

BETH KRIKORIAN / COLLEGIAN

A women's health symposium was held at the Hillel House Tuesday night.

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

The first thing Tina Koppel will tell you about her experience with breast cancer, is that she is not a victim.

Three years ago the Sharon, Mass. resident was diagnosed with the disease, and has since had a lumpectomy, mastectomy, chemotherapy and reconstructive surgery.

Koppel was among the presenters at last night's Symposium on Women's Health titled, "Your Breasts, Bones, and Body. A Proactive Evening of Dialogue and Learning," held at the Hillel House.

Co–sponsored by the Western New England Region of Hadassah (a women's Zionist organization) and Hillel, the program aimed to educate women to take control of their health at an early age, as well as provide a space for bereaving students to converse.

Junior Chanel Dubofsky organized the event because she lost her mother last year to breast cancer. The symposium was dedicated to her memory.

During a self–exam, Koppel noticed something strange about her breast when she raised her arm in the shower one day. The abnormality was not immediately diagnosed as malignant, but a biopsy from her doctor showed the need for a lumpectomy.

After her experience said Koppel, her life has changed — for the better.

"If you want to be a victim in any situation you can choose to be. But if you're human things happen," she said.

"I've learned to live for the moment. You must love yourself. I get a massage every other week and I love it. Now I'm travelling. You really have to be your own best friend."

Also speaking was Patricia Levenson, the chairwoman of the Hadassah's National Health Education program, and travels the country speaking to women about health topics.

One of the issues Levenson talked about was the difficulty in educating the orthodox Jewish community about breast cancer.

"You can't mention the word breast let alone the issue of mammograms. We [Hadassah] are trying to work with the more enlightened rabbis in the community," she said.

Levenson also spoke of the fear held by Ashkenazi (Eastern European) Jews, who are at greater risk of certain diseases, including breast cancer.

"There is a fear that they will be stigmatized as a 'cancer community.' There are many studies being done with this group," she said, "They are afraid that things like insurance rates might go up for them."

As far as breast cancer detection goes, Levenson said there are all kinds of different ways being used to detect cancer, ultrasounds, MRI's, but that mammography is the best possible machinery yet.

"Within ten years, there will probably be more available."

But, added Levenson, the best way for young women to take prevention against breast cancer, is to adopt a healthier lifestyle that includes proper diet and exercise.

Self–breast exams, are another excellent tool for prevention.

"Hadassah goes into 11th and 12th grade classrooms to teach girls to do self breast exams so it becomes regular, like brushing their teeth," she said.

"Through these programs several of the students have found lumps," she said, "They've also passed the information along to their parents. We've had at least one parent from every one of these programs detect a lump too."

One woman making a change: helping others reclaim power

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

While most college students spend a lot of their time worrying about how much money they will make when they graduate, Charlotte Capogna, a crisis intervention counselor for the University of Massachusetts Everywoman's Center, spends much of her time worrying about how she can help others.

For some time, Capogna knew that she wanted to do some kind of volunteer work. "I was especially interested in hotline work," she explains. "It was between this and suicide counseling," said Capogna. She began to lean towards rape crisis counseling because she says, "I knew a lot of people who had been affected by sexual assault."

Capogna has worked as a volunteer at the Everywoman's Center for about three and half years. She explains that she wanted to "help people to stop hurting and I felt that I was at a place where I was strong enough to do this." As a crisis intervention counselor, Capogna, along with other counselors, can provide short–term counseling to victims of sexual assault or victims of child abuse.

Although all of the crisis intervention counselors at the Everywoman's Center are certified by the Massachusetts Rape Crisis Intervention Center, they are not trained therapists. If people need more counseling, they will be referred to a therapist for further help.

"We do goal counseling, which consists of ten sessions," said Capogna. "We try to help people with immediate problems, like if someone is having trouble sleeping or needs help going back to school."

While most people would consider her work to be emotionally draining, Capogna said, "it's not hard because it is so fulfilling. Even just one hotline call is worth it," said Capogna, because of how important it is for the person on the other end of the phone. In cases of domestic abuse, she explains, "it can be the pivotal point of getting a person away from someone who could kill them."

As a second semester senior, Capogna has used her experience to develop her Bachelor's Degree with an Individual Concentration (BDIC) major in therapeutic counseling and activism for social improvement. "I'm interested in combining holistic medicine with counseling and health care reform so that low–income people can have access to holistic medicine," she explained.

In expressing the sense of fulfillment she gets from working at the Everywoman's Center, Capogna attributed some of it to the people she works with. "Everyone there is so nice and having a strong support network is so important in this field," said Capogna.

Although her contribution to the community has been immeasurable, Capogna explains, "I don't feel noble because of what I do. I couldn't just exist while there are so many things upsetting and hurting people. I just couldn't be passive. I can sleep at night because I know that I'm helping someone."

Tampon users beware

A few months ago I received a shocking e–mail from my sister. In it she stated an alarming fact followed by information she received in an e–mail sent to her. The information she sent me was about the ingredients used in tampons — one of them being bleach. Yes, that is right; tampons contain bleach and bleach causes cancer. A woman who chooses to use tampons at the time of her cycle probably changes them on average of six times a day and a cycle usually last five to seven days. The average woman uses anywhere from 30 or 42 tampons during her cycle.

Kathleen M. Cammarata

I took particular interest in this matter and decided to go to Bread & Circus to look at their sanitary products. One company, Natracare, states it uses 100 percent pure cotton. I decided to purchase a box, to compare the difference between natural tampons and tampons containing bleach dye. To my surprise, I found no difference between the brand of tampons I normally use and these natural tampons, except for the price. Natural tampons are much more costly and per package contain fewer tampons.

I honestly cannot give you any statistics on woman who have been diagnosed with cancer caused by bleach. I have never heard of a woman being affected by her choice of tampons, but just because I have never heard of it, does not mean it can not happen. I know that Toxic Shock Syndrome (TSS) is a potential fatal disease caused by an overgrowth of bacteria due to tampon use.

So I'd like to take this opportunity to pass on information given to me and you can decide what to do with it. Some suggestions I have, if this is a major concern of yours, is to either switch your brand of tampons to a company that does not use harmful chemicals like bleach, or write and/or call your tampon company and inquire for more information on the different ingredients used in their tampons and the effect they can have on you.

JULIA FORDHAM COLLECTION
Julia Fordham
Virgin

Julia Fordham sums up her career so far with material taken from her five albums. Two new songs entice fans to pick this up, proving she is one of the best at creating elegant love songs. Her gorgeous voice is usually supported by lush instrumentals that end up getting her labelled as an adult contemporary artist. A remix of "Happily Every After" peps things up, but only briefly. A must have for all Everything But The Girl (pre–drum and bass days) fans out there. B (Matthew Nixon)

VINICIUS CANTUARIA
Tucuma
Verve

Brazilian Tropicalia sounds along the lines of Astrud Gilberto. The trademark acoustic guitar of the genre is handled well and the two opening tracks suggest summer is not far away. Not content to mellow out for an entire album, Cantuaria revs it up on several tracks with drumming and the squeals of cellos. Luminaries from the jazz and pop world pop up on every track. Laurie Anderson trades vocals with Cantuaria on "Retirante" and Sean Lennon adds non- descript bass lines to four tracks. Not a bad CD to chill out to on an evening when it still light at 8 p.m. B (M.N.)

GO
Music From The Motion Picture WORK

FORCES OF NATURE
Music from the Original Motion Picture
Dreamworks

These two collections have much in common, yet one stands out as one of the more thought–out soundtracks of the moment. The two both use a majority of tunes full of dance beats. There are several odds choices on both. Forces of Nature wins out as the choice pick of the two. Surprised? This music propelled the Sandra Bullock and Ben Affleck romantic comedy along. Who would have thought that its accompanying soundtrack would feature compelling music from today's top club acts. One of the soundtrack's executive producers is Bullock!

Sometimes sinister Faithless appear twice with "If Lovin' You Is Wrong" and the current smash "Bring My Family Back." Lead singer Rollo's vocal style has a lot in common and the coupling of one of the Faithless tracks with a brand new track from Tricky is a true gift. The basic trip–hop track introduces his latest protege, Carmen Ejogo, who sounds a lot like one–time regular co–vocalist Martina. Upbeat tunes pop up all over the disc. Touch & Go's "Would you...?" has a bubbly salsa feel to it; complete with whistle sounds.

One can tell that the GO soundtrack started out with the best of intentions. It accompanies a Katie Holmes flick that centers around club life. Several top–notch dance tracks do appear, but this collection lacks a unifying mood which Forces succeeds in achieving. A new track from Leftfield is the only real surprise here. Featuring vocalist Nicole Willis, "Swords" is destined for chart–topping success.

The new song from No Doubt "New" is everywhere at the moment and sounds just like we've come to expect from them. Surprises are the super remix of Eagle Eye Cherry's "Shouting Up In Vain" featuring samples from jazz albums recorded by his dad, Don Cherry and the incredibly dull "Believer" from one–time dance floor king BT. Go: B– Forces of Nature: B+ (M.N.)

BUILT FOR SPEED
Motorhead
Victory

Motorhead makes a serious bid for the greatest pure rock group ever. There's still, after all these years, something rebellious and enigmatic in their self–titled 1977 debut that makes even the most die hard Dave Matthews fan show the sign of Pan in their support of heavy metal.

Well, maybe not Dave Matthews, but certainly the folks at Victory Records, who found it fitting to release a Motorhead tribute album.

Built For Speed shows why Lemmy and the Boys will always rule rock 'n' roll. With covers by a diverse group of bands — ranging from Blood For Blood to the Groovie Ghoulies — Built For Speed is a tollbooth leading into the longhaired and leather jacketed world of metal's poster–iron cross bearers.

Japanese prints at Amherst

By Yemisi Mokuolu
Collegian Correspondent

Currently at the Mead Art Museum at Amherst College is a collection of Ukiyo–e woodblock prints titled Creative Transformations: Japanese Prints from the Collection of William Green.

Over the years, Green has donated over 600 images of large "breath, scope and quality" to the Mead Art Museum. Over 100 are being exhibited in this show.

The exhibition reveals advanced techniques in commercial and private woodblock printing. A system was perfected to produce these images on a commercial basis. Artists drew, cutters carved drawings onto woodblock, printers chose colors, inked the blocks and transferred the images to paper. Creating an assembly line allowed each person to be expert in their field.

Samuel C. Morse, professor of fine arts at Amherst College, explained, "Once the drawing leaves the artist's hand, the publisher would determined the appearance of the finished image."

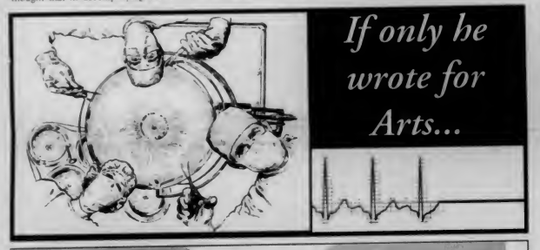
The artist's level of expertise is evident in the technical precision of these printed images. The accuracy of color application is highly advanced, almost mechanical in appearance. Ink hardly bleeds out of place. The color palette is varied, from soft to intense hues.

"The Sino–Japanese Naval Battle between Cats and Mice," done in June 1895 by publisher Matsuno Yonejiro, is "a children's print showing brave Japanese cats vanquishing a navy of Chinese rates." This is a very colorful illustration. The image concentrates on using intense blue, yellow and red.

Morse explained that parodying contemporary figures with animals was a humorous devise. He continued, saying that using animal representation was also a form of censorship. They did not want to directly antagonize a situation.

"Chrysanthemum dolls," completed circa 1810 by Totoya Hokkei (1780–1850), was created with intricate woodblock carving. Each petal has been actualized by ink. This attention to detail makes the flowers very sumptuous, delicate and tactile. The colors have been diluted, which further softens the print.

This print is a "Surimono," which means that it was a privately commissioned print. Many poets who privately commissioned them inscribed their prints with verses. Rokujuen inscribed this image.



Composition is a great concern in all of these images. Positioning and color are aesthetically balanced and carefully considered. The collection contains several literary narratives, which use these techniques as dramatic devices.

The relationship of character to character and character to space is contrived, creating a real sense of drama. In all of these images action does not occur beyond the paper's edge. This holds in much of the drama. Characters are in dynamic poses: their limbs are gestured. Attention to facial expressions also conveys the characters emotional state.

Bando Mitsugoro III, in a double role as Kan Shojo, and his loyal retainer, Takebe Genzo, published by Ibaya Senzaburo, is a tale in which "Genzo sacrificed his own son to save the life of his master's child." Before reading this caption we sense humility, concern and sadness. This is created through the down–turned mouths and upward gazes.

The portraying of emotion is very sophisticated. The artist has managed to capture intense emotion with slight abbreviated brush strokes. All emotion is derived from their faces. The bodies are not gestured or animated. Their highly decorated clothing flattens the painting and dampens emotion in their bodies.

The Ukiyo–e artists showed little concern for depth of space. The objects are pushed up to the frontal plane. There is only slight recession to convey what is in front and what is behind.

Leaving the paper plain makes the background stark and further flattens the images. The images become like comic strip illustrations and not illusionist paintings.

The majority of the prints in this exhibitions are flat. It is only until the late 1730s that the Ukiyo–e prints in this exhibition show a use of Western perspective.

"The Forty–seven Ronin crossing the Sumida River to attack Lord Kira's mansion," done in the mid 1850s by Utagawa Hiroshige (17–97–1858) illustrates Ukiyo–e artist's handling Western perspective.

Hiroshige's image shows a mastering of perspective and a fusing of Japanese style. He creates depth of space, without loosing the figural flatness of Japanese art.

Ukiyo–e artists faced many problems when dealing in large scale. This image illustrates how they would create several sections and piece them together to create a larger image.

This image is a triptych, which means it has three separate parts. In most cases the colors are different shades in each panel. The colors in the middle panel are considerably richer than in the left panel. The varying shades between the middle and right panels are apparent but hardly noticeable.

Morse says the exhibition illustrates the prominent use of real and mythical animals, warriors, sumo wrestlers and children as subject matter in 17th to 18th century Japanese art.

The exhibition is now on and will be running until May. 30. Quoted information came from the Mead Art Museum.

SEXPLOSION!
HIT & RUN HOLIDAY
My Life With the Thrill Kill Kult
Rykodisc

Sleazy, trashy, perverse... the marks of quality. What began as an idea of a tribute film to tabloid press a la Russ Meyer/John Waters turned into a highly influential disco/glam/industrial outfit that set the precedent for many shock–rock bands to come.

My Life With the Thrill Kill Kult is widely known (alongside KMFDM) as the band that brought industrial music onto the dance floors. The work of Frank Nardiello and Marston Daley (a.k.a. Groovie Mann and Buzz McCoy, respectively), a curious mix of synths, samples, sound effects and campy fun, has pleased fans since they broke onto the '80's club scene.

Just the covers of these albums should let you know what you're in for. The pink–tinted photo of Bettie Page, the tacky stars and the neon lettering gives Sexplosion! the strip club look it was going for. 13 Above the Night sports the science fiction, Star Wars/"Dr. Who" look, and Hit & Run Holiday looks like the perfect poster for a poorly made midnight movie, with its depiction of a valley doll and pills raining from above.

Available for quite some time only in used record stores, Ryko has re–released these lost LPs that were shuffled around from label to label. Originally on Chicago's Wax Trax label, which released their classic 1990 album, Confessions of a Knife, the Thrill Kill Kult was picked up by Interscope, which reissued Sexplosion! in 1992, 13 Above the Night in 1993, and Hit & Run Holiday in 1995. They later moved to Red Ant, which released 1997's A Crime for All Seasons, which Ryko plans to reissue sometime in the near future.

These albums sound vastly different from one another, but they are undoubtedly some of the funkiest material recorded by the band. Sexplosion! starts off with a healthy groove in the form of "The International Sin Set." The album carries with it a perverse, high sleaze/trashy art concept with "Leatherjes," "A Martini Built for 2," and, what is far and away the best song on the album, "Sex On Wheelz."

13 Above the Night is the most aggressive album of the three. The opening track, "The Velvet Edge" sets the album's jagged tone. "Final Blindness" is one of the most memorable songs on this disc. Despite the heavier nature of this album, 13 Above the Night contains all the soul and funk featured on Sexplosion!, but the spotlight on this disc belongs to McCoy's guitar.

Hit & Run Holiday sounds like just the swinging '60's soundtrack... if it collided with grinding industrial. "Glamour Is a Rocky Road," and "Apollo 69" are some memorable cuts. Each album, with the exception of Hit & Run Holiday, contains some bonus tracks and remixes.

Thrill Kill Kult's twisted take on top 40, their demonic Cabaret style and their love for cheesy sleaze will allow them to retain their status as one of the most original and underrated shock rock bands in history. The re–release of these albums will delight countless fans, introduce TKK to new listeners and will surely provide yet another scapegoat for deviant teenage behavior. Sexplosion!: A–, 13 Above the Night: B, Hit & Run Holiday: B+

Pratt to read her poetry

In celebration of National Poetry Month, Pulitzer Prize nominee Minnie Bruce Pratt will read from her new collection of poetry Walking Back Up Depot Street tonight, at 7 p.m. in Hasbrouck Auditorium Room 126 at the University of Massachusetts.

Born and educated in Alabama, much of her work stems from her experiences in the South. Pratt's fourth collection of poetry is said to evoke powerful images of what is both a story of the segregated rural South and the story of one woman's struggle to free herself from the lies of her childhood.

In her dramatic narrative poems, Bruce utilizes the words and rhythms of Bible Belt preachers, African–American Blues and of share–cropper country women and urban lesbians. In her poems, she presents the testimony of freed slaves and white abolitionists speaking against Ku Klux Klan violence, speeches by union organizers and songs from those who marched on the road to Selma, Ala.

Bruce has written three other volumes of poetry and co–authored Yours in Struggle: Three Feminist Perspectives on Anti–Semitism and Racism with Elly Bulkin and Barbara Smith.

Bruce has been the recipient of the Lamont Poetry Award, the American Library Association Gay and Lesbian Award, and the Lillian Hellman–Dashiell Hammett Award.

Bruce's visit is sponsored by Food For Thought Bookstore, Everywoman's Center, the Stonewall Center and the Creative Writing Program at Amherst College.

This event is free, open to the public and wheelchair accessible. There will be a book signing at Food For Thought Books from 4:30–5:30 p.m.

will — like Buddy Hoffman and Brendan Glass, two influential players before him — kick a teammate in the butt or pat him on the back when warranted.

"I like to think that Mike learned through his four years that he got that type of help," Cannella said. "Now he's a part of that, giving that back whether it's academics or whether it's lacrosse or life.

"Mike has come a long way here. That's part of it. He's persevered and grown into a fine man, personally," Cannella continued. "I chose him as a captain because I think he cares about others more so than about himself at times."

McKeefrey is also willing to adapt for the sake of his team. He came to UMass as an attackman and hardly stepped on the field. As a sophomore he played in the midfield, went back to attack as a junior and has been a midfield mainstay this season, playing a primary role in the Minutemen's extra-man situations.

As a result of the constant role evolution, McKeefrey has seen his numbers fluctuate as well. Last year he finished third on the team in scoring with 13 goals and six assists. This season, playing predominantly as a set-up man, he commands the assist category with 15 feeds. But his scoring touch hasn't disappeared; he does have a goal to his credit.

"As far as playing attack, I was able to be on the field a little more last year. This year they looked for me to control the ball, take advantage of short sticks, create some offense, things like that," he said. "Last year I moved the ball a little bit on the perimeter, but I'd also be a crease attackman and I got most of my opportunities off ball movement. This year I'm more of a creator. I try to move the ball to the next guy."

It is a job that McKeefrey willingly accepts.

"I don't care [what position I play]. I just want to win. That's always been the most important thing to me. Winning," he said. "You could score eight goals in a game and have five assists and if you lose you're not going to feel good afterward. Winning and losing, the team concept, that's the most important thing. It is to me."

That tenacity, that willingness to do whatever the teams needs for a victory, is evidenced by the second line of McKeefrey's media guide biography: "Does the little things to be good."

"Groundballs, communicating, setting up the offense, you need to have [those things]," McKeefrey said.

And, according to Cannella, the senior's job also includes the proverbial dirty work, the behind-the-scenes work that doesn't always get noticed.

"He'll set picks for people, he'll get other people open. It's important to your offensive team to be able to play off the ball. Whether you're setting a pick off the ball or getting to a spot where you're in a help position off the ball, it's very important."

McKeefrey and his four fellow seniors will play their final home game Friday night at Garber Field at 7 p.m. But he will be back to the field in the future.

"You can't just walk away from this," McKeefrey said. "I want to see the program continue to see it grow. I'll be back to watch games, for the alumni game. UMass is about good people, I'm not going to walk away from that."

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

The Minutemen had to stretch out their effort to keep a step ahead of Harvard in the Beanpot Tournament in Boston. UMass escaped with a 13–12 win. See related story on page 12.

ately thought I can't play — it was very disappointing," she said.

MacNabb came out that day against Hofstra, which for all she knew could have been her last game of the year, and buried a goal — one of eight on the season — and two assist (she had six this season) and really opened some eyes.

"It made me appreciate what I had. Colleen [Wales, who tore an ACL early in the year] told me, 'At least you guys can play,' I think that's how I felt. And when Kathy [the team trainer] cleared me for that game, I thought I better just go all out, because I was day-to-day. I knew that the next day I was going to see Dr. McBride and he was going to tell me 'yes' or 'no' for the rest of the season and I just went out and gave it my best shot," MacNabb said.

MacNabb has had a solid season, production-wise. She has collected all of her career assists this season. She also had five goals her sophomore year in 13 games. MacNabb's presence is most felt not in her 13 games started, her 38 games played nor her career goals and 19 career points. Instead it is felt in the junior leadership she brings for the young players on the field, evident while she played with her injuries and helped lead an already depleted squad.

"Because I had a bad season last year and I start now, I understand what the bench players are going through and I can really relate to everyone out there. I don't see myself as one of the huge leaders out there, but I try to lead by example. I trust my coaches and work as hard as I can and hopefully I can only get better. My experience of not playing makes me that much stronger and work that much harder," MacNabb said of her leadership role this season.

As an intelligent set-up attacker, a great stick handler and a taller player — MacNabb has been able to bring some more leadership to the offense, which took a severe dent when Fay Naber left for family reasons after only seven games. This was a huge loss for the Minutewomen and someone had to fill that role. MacNabb was the logical candidate, and she has been a rock at that position.

"Sara certainly brings height and finishing ability and adds another dimension to our offense," McClellan said.

MacNabb has also been key in UMass' battle with injuries this season, as many of the players have been off the bench.

"Just the fact that we have overcome all the injuries and we're still winning games as a team, even though some of the players we lost were so imperative to our team," MacNabb said. "Just the fact that everyone has stepped up, that shows a lot about our program and the heart that's on our team."

Although the goals have changed for the Minutewomen the style is still the same for MacNabb. Consistency, hard work, versatility and production as well as leading by example will continue to be the keys for "Snare" and the Minutewomen as they head into Atlantic 10 Championships this weekend.

The Minutewomen will face Virginia Tech in the first round of the tourney and look for a return date with Temple in the finals. For MacNabb and company, a win over Temple would be a sweet way to end an at times bitter season. But in order to do that they will have to not overlook Virginia Tech.

"We talked about that. We are out to get Temple, but we're not going to get there unless we beat Virginia Tech and it was a one point game [the first time we played]," MacNabb said. "I think that we are just going to have to show up to play against Virginia Tech. I don't think we are overlooking V-Tech. I think the team really wants this weekend and we are going to show up strong."

Sara MacNabb's nickname "Snare" has nothing to do with the midfielder's able stick skills, strangely enough, but rather a song by Snoop Dogg.

Finneran plots to keep Pats in Mass.

By Jean McMillen
Associated Press

BOSTON — House Speaker Thomas Finneran is a man with a plan — a plan to keep the New England Patriots in Massachusetts. Finneran would not release details of his plan yesterday, but said he was discussing it privately with fellow Statehouse leaders and NFL officials.

"I am confident that the acceptance of my plan, or any similarly equitable plan, will pave the way for prompt passage of a bill in the House of Representatives," Finneran said in a statement yesterday afternoon.

Finneran (D-Boston) met Monday evening with NFL officials, Republican Gov. Paul Cellucci and Senate President Thomas Birmingham (D-Chelsea), who had requested the "summit."

The group was to meet again last night to continue its talks.

Comments Finneran has made in the past few days hint at what might be included in the proposal.

On Monday, Finneran said he favored the idea of having the team grant easements to the state which would allow the state to provide money for roads and other infrastructure on the Foxboro stadium site.

That would address his opposition to using taxpayer money to improve private property. Finneran had also objected to a provision in the Senate plan that would have had the state buy land around the stadium for $20 million and then lease it back to the team. In the House plan approved last year, Finneran had agreed to the state spending up to $57 million for infrastructure. The Senate plan called for $52 million in infrastructure in addition to the land purchase.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You're not one to be easily dominated today. You are feeling strong, inspired and energetic. Later in the day, you may enjoy an emotional rejuvenation.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Your vision into the past and future is clearer now than it has ever been. You may even be enlightened about a former friend or lover.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — A look into the future may yield a surprising vision today. Now is not the time to shrug off any instincts. Take the time to begin making concrete plans.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Bargain hunting can surely pay off handsomely today, and you may be surprised to learn just what it is you really like in the way of home comforts.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Now is not the time to be too leisurely or relaxed. Success depends on your attention, care and dedication in every step of the way.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — This is a good day for exploring what lies before you at a fast or slow pace, whatever suits your mood at the moment. Curiosity reigns.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — This may prove to be a busy, fast-paced day. There is a lot for you to get done at this time in order to prepare for upcoming events and endeavors.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You mustn't rush into anything today. Take the time to consider options, determine the risks involved, and plan for unexpected developments.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Your enthusiastic approach is catching today, and others will benefit from your energy and vision. This is no time to lie low. Take a stand!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Cost is not a major factor today. You're more concerned with value, at least for now. Remember the axiom, "It's the thought that counts."

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Issues revolving around career and/or home stability will demand your attention today, even though you're supposed to be "off" at this time.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — What sneaks up on you today is likely to be most important. Take care you don't ignore the little things going on around you.

Quote of the Day

"I don't like being outdoors Smithers, for one thing, there's too many fat children"

–Mr. Burns

Close to Home By John McPherson

It was not until they entered the principal's office that the Keppelmans realized the severity of Ryans discipline problem.

Appell gives out NBA report card and Knicks fail

As the 1999 shortened NBA regular season mercifully draws to a close, it appears that the end of two wannabe-dynasty teams appears inevitable as well. It was beyond an assumption that the Chicago Bulls, a legitimate dynasty mind you, would become a league laughing stock with the departure of that Jordan character and his running mate Scottie Pippen.

However, entering this season few expected the championship dreams, even playoff aspirations, would go by the wayside for the New York Knicks and Seattle SuperSonics.

Sanford Appell on the NBA

Both squads have been perennial playoff teams since the mid-1980s, and have each appeared in the NBA Finals once in the 1990s.

Before this season, they each tinkered with their team make-up, with the Knicks adding Latrell Sprewell and Marcus Camby, and the Sonics replacing coach George Karl with ex-Sun honcho Paul Westphal.

Neither reconstruction has proven fruitful, and Knick GM Ernie Grunfeld has become the first casualty as a result. Bringing in the reputable Spree-ell has been as large a disaster as was predicted earlier in this forum.

His personality has not meshed on this new-look Knick squad, and the combination of Spree and fellow two-guard Allan Houston has been lethal — to themselves.

The Knicks are now clinging to the coveted eighth spot in the Eastern Conference playoff scheme in a year they thought they were the heir-apparent to the NBA crown.

Out west, rain is coming down hard in Seattle, as is the pressure on Westphal's shoulders to even qualify for the dance.

The Sonics were unable to land any of the high-priced, names this summer, and hampering injuries to star forward Vin Baker have left Seattle one game behind Sacramento(!!) for the final seed.

One can only hope Westphal has a well-paying day job if Seattle misses the cut.

Also on the chopping board right now is Kurt Rambis. While the Knicks give his Lakers a run for their money, this team has to be one of the most underachieving teams in league history.

Forget the nonsense that the Fakers have nobody outside of their big-three of Shaq, Kobe and Rice — what more can one ask for?

They have the most dominant post-man in the game, no offense Karl Malone, possibly the league's best pure shooter, and a 22-year-old who can do it all.

L.A. is 20-13 under Rambis' misguidance, and you can believe his rear is on the line if he does not at least reach the Finals.

It appears Paul Silas' Hornets may have run out of gas, and it's a shame. Aside from Derelict Coleman, Charlotte is the anti-NBA team, a unit composed of team-first, go for broke players who have resurrected a ship that was halfway down the ocean.

David Wesley and Eddie Jones currently form one of the best, if not most underrated backcourts in the league, and even Elden Campbell is playing hard, but two recent losses to the Knicks may have sealed their fate, at least for this year.

So who has the best team in Texas? Well it's not the Mavericks. Contrary to my earlier belief that they were of playoff caliber, they are still a few (light) years away.

But the question concerning the Rockets and Spurs is still debatable. The Spurs have been on a tear, even proving for the time being that Tim Duncan and David Robinson can co-exist in the middle. But the playoffs will be the true test for the Twin Towers, hopefully once and for all.

San Antonio will be well-advised to make up for this year's thriftiness, and go after Mitch Richmond, a malcontent in D.C., to solidify its chances for its first title.

All is not well around Compaq Center, despite a convincing Rocket thrashing of Team Hollywood Tuesday night. Charles Barkley has been rambling on as usual, and Scottie Pippen was picked up for DUI.

Barkley's disparaging comments about Clyde Drexler blaming him for last season's debacle are particularly disturbing.

Remember, "Sir" Charles, the Rockets won two titles without you (one with Drexler on board), so it says here, win this one or retire.

Game of the Night: Seattle at Portland, 10 p.m. It will be interesting to see what Seattle has left in the tank, as it visits the NBA's second best team with its livelihood on the line. The Sonics will need Gary Payton to dominate the stellar point-guard match up with Damon Stoudamire.

UM offense takes center stage

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

The UMass baseball team went to Fenway Park to play for the whole "pot of beans" at Boston's annual Beanpot Tournament. Yesterday, the Minutemen opened up competition with a win against Harvard.

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Anyone who expected a pitchers' duel in yesterday's Beanpot Tournament semifinal matchup between the Massachusetts and Harvard baseball teams was in for a rude awakening when they arrived at Fenway Park yesterday afternoon.

Offense was definitely not a problem for either team in the second semifinal contest of the day, as the two squads combined for 25 runs and 32 hits in UMass' 13-12 win.

Pitching, on the other hand, was a totally different story.

It was safe to say that no hurler who took to the mound yesterday had complete success. Even the winning pitcher, UMass' Jesse Santos, allowed four fourth-inning runs before finally settling down in his final three and one-third innings of work.

Some games are pitchers' duels and some games are slugfests, and yesterday's game had all the elements of a high scoring affair. Eight of the nine starters on each team had a hit, while a total of 10 players had multiple-hit games for their respective squads.

"I like those 1-0 gaines a lot better. When you give up 18 hits in a game usually you aren't going to have a chance to win," Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone said. "But we did a great job of coming back and then holding on. We were a little shaky at the end, but it was a good ballgame."

The purely offensive mode was set right from the game's opening pitch. UMass put two runs up on its board in its first at-bat before the Crimson responded with a pair of their own in the bottom of the inning.

From there, all hell broke loose.

After Aaron Braunstein put UMass up 4-2 in the third inning on a two-run bomb over the Green Monster, Harvard went on to score eight straight runs and knock Minuteman starter Todd Samolewicz out of the game in the process. Santos entered in the fourth but was quickly greeted with four more Crimson runs.

Trailing 10-4 in the top of the fifth, UMass found itself in a familiar position. The Maroon and White had trailed Vermont 7-2 in the third inning last week, but eventually rallied to claim an 11-8 win.

Not willing to roll over and play dead just yet, the Minutemen began to claw back. The Minutemen scored four runs in the fifth and three more in the seventh to make it 10-9. Freshman Chris Morgan then came through with a two-run single in the top of the seventh to regain the lead at 11-10.

For the time being, it looked like the comeback kids had found a way to win another important ballgame.

Santos, however, started to tire in the eighth and was relieved by Nick Skirkanich. Looking for insurance runs, sophomore Nick Gorneault connected for his fourth hit of the day, a two-run blast over the Monster that padded the UMass lead to 13-10 going into the bottom of the ninth.

This one, however, was far from over.

Harvard loaded the bases with nobody out in their last at- bat. With already one run in, a sacrifice fly by Andrew Huling cut the UMass lead to a run at 13-12. Skirkanich, however, then forced Eric Binkowski to bounce into the game-ending double play.

"Our attitude is that we are never out of a game. At one point we were down 10-4, but we always feel confident that we can come back," said Gorneault, who was 4-for-4 with two runs scored and five RBI. "We have a lot of weapons that give us the ability to come back."

All but one of the seven pitchers used gave up at least one run. The lone pitcher who didn't, Harvard's Matt Devine, still allowed UMass catcher Brian Sameta, one of his inherited runners, to score on an RBI groundout by Kevin O'Connell.

Yesterday was clearly not a day for the pitchers — and that may hurt UMass come tomorrow's 2 p.m. championship game against Boston College.

Stone made it clear that he doesn't intend to use one of his weekend pitchers as a starter, so freshman Brian Hourigan will get only his third start of the year against the Eagles. However, if the Minutemen stay hot at the plate, it will be the BC pitchers who are in for a long afternoon.

Williams helps Pistons pick apart Celtics, 92-85

BOSTON (AP) — The Detroit Pistons got some unexpected help as they beat the Boston Celtics to cling to seventh place in the Eastern Conference playoff race.

Jerome Williams scored 21 points, grabbed 14 rebounds — 11 offensive — and had seven steals as the Pistons won 92-85 yesterday night.

"Jerome played an outstanding game for us," Pistons coach Alvin Gentry said. "He made steals, got rebounds and his effort defensively in the fourth quarter was a key to the win."

Williams has started the last five games for Detroit and the Pistons have won the last two.

"Starting has made all the difference for me lately," Williams said. "We had to put it out at the end, they weren't going to quit, we had to take it away from them."

Grant Hill scored 10 of his 32 points in the final quarter, including the go-ahead basket with 3:01 to play, while the Pistons held Boston to 3-of-21 shooting and forced five turnovers. "It didn't look good at all. It baffles me we came up with the win," Hill said. "It looked like they were the team in the seventh spot and we were out of the playoffs. But I don't think there was a doubt in anyone's mind that we couldn't get back in the game."

But the difference was Williams.

"There are a few guys that aren't necessarily big names but because of their skill level on defense and on the backboard can be game changers," Celtics coach Rick Pitino said. "Tonight Jerome Williams, in every phase of the game, was a game changer." The Pistons wiped out a 10-point fourth quarter deficit. "We didn't play too well in the first quarter. But, we stuck in there and kept it close," Hill said. "We took some good shots down the stretch and executed well."

Paul Pierce led the Celtics with 21 points and Walter McCarty added 17, but it wasn't enough to prevent the Celtics from being swept by Detroit in the season series.

"We took the game away from ourselves," Pierce said.

The Pistons held the Celtics scoreless over the first five minutes of the fourth quarter while they cut Boston's lead to 73-72 on a jumper by Hill with 7:35 left.

"It was a great win for us," Gentry said. "The one thing we tried to do was put pressure on the inbounds play and force their big men to put the ball on the floor."

The Celtics turned the ball over 26 times leading to 34 Detroit points.

Hill gave the Pistons the lead for good at 82-80 on a jumper with three minutes remaining. Jud Buechler sealed the win with a 3-pointer with 1:39 to play.

"We played better defensively (in the fourth quarter)," Buechler said. "We realized we were running out of time and then our offense just clicked."

McKeefrey leads by example for men's lax

Senior co-captain Mike McKeefrey's tenacious play has put him at the top of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's assist category with 15 feeds.

The White team was down one and the clock was ticking. Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella called out the time. "One minute!" The scrimmaging players kept fighting.

The White team moved, setting its offense, straining against tired muscles and the chilly wind that washed over Richard F. Garber Field every few minutes. Jay Negus flipped the ball to Mike Young; back again to Negus. The ball was worked around the back of the cage. It came to a momentary rest with John Madigan. Madigan saw senior Mike McKeefrey moving in toward the left post of the Maroon goal.

A quick pass, a shot at shin-level. Overtime, thanks to a McKeefrey goal.

After the White team turned the ball over in overtime, Evan Paige chased down a member of the Maroon team, coming only a pace away from catching him. "Almost E.P. One step away," McKeefrey shouted.

That is McKeefrey: the epitome of leadership. A senior co-captain who

"Snare" a solid contributer

BETH KRIKORIAN / COLLEGIAN

Junior Minutewoman Sara MacNabb fought through two tibia stress fractures to continue to perform for the injury- riddled women's lacrosse team.

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is thinking consistency, determination, hard work and versatility, one of the names in the lineup that can't help but stand out this season is Sara MacNabb.

The junior mldfielder/attack has been the definition of all of those aforementioned aspects of the game. The Clay, N.Y. native has used her family heritage in the game of lacrosse, her stick skills, her height and her determination to show what she is capable of on the offensive side of the ball.

"Her stick skills are her strength. She has really brought consistency and stability down low, especially with all the injuries, and has filled the role without a lot of playing experience," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said.

MacNabb's father, Terry, was an All-American in high school and played lacrosse at Cornell University and now officiates men's lacrosse. That is how MacNabb, who began playing organized lacrosse in eighth grade, picked up the sport. She began playing as a little girl with a men's stick and has played it ever since.

"Snare" or "Snare Dog," as she is know by her teammates, has had — like the Minutewomen — an up and down season.

"Actually, it [the nickname] started in high school. It was a song about Snoop Dog, and they would call me Snare Dog, and Lynne [Young] still calls me that. Everyone calls me Snare, parents calls me Snare," MacNabb said.

The Minutewomen had high hopes of the NCAA tournament at the beginning of the season, but then suffered some devastating losses to Boston University, Syrcause and Brown. The team began losing some confidence. With that MacNabb's hopes of playing were almost dashed, as she nearly got caught up in the team's rash of injuries.

"We had some good freshmen coming in and we were really looking to go to NCAAs this year. We had [Jen] Nardi back, [Melissa] Anderson, [Laura] Korutz, Lynne — all great players, so we thought we were going pretty far, but a couple early losses really set us back," MacNabb said.

"I think we weren't really confident, especially after BU. We played so horribly. After that, people just tryed to step it up, I know I tried to go out and play as hard as I could, but because we had so many injuries it brought us down so much and took us away from our goal."

MacNabb received the word that she might have to miss a good portion of the season the day of the Hofstra game, due to the fact that doctors discoverd she had stress factures in both her legs. This was a devastating blow after finally getting the opportunity to start.

"I was where I wanted to be. I had just started a couple of games when I heard about my legs. I've always had shin splints," MacNabb said of her injuries. "I had a bone scan, and in the meantimc I kept playing. I was surprised when they told me I tested positive for stress fractures in my legs.

"The trainer had told me before, if it's stress fractures they would havc me sit out for like five weeks. I immedi-

Effects of Colo. shooting hit home at area schools

By Stacey Shackford and Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Flags have been waving at half-mast at schools across the country as constant reminders of the recent high school killings in Littleton, Colo.

A number of copy-cat attempts and bomb scares have also been harsh reminders, and yesterday morning — one week after the Colorado incident — students at Amherst Regional Middle and High Schools realized they were not immune.

At 10:30 a.m., approximately 700 middle school and 1,300 high school students were dismissed after Superintendent of Schools Gus Sayer received a bomb threat.

"The first thought that went through my mind is that this had to be related to what happened in Colorado," Crystal Dunn, an eighth-grade student at the middle school said. She also noted that it was the first day of the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System (MCAS) tests.

The bomb threat came into the central number for the school system at approximately 8:45 a.m., Sayer said. He immediately contacted the police and fire departments to "consult over what would be the best" way to proceed.

"We were careful and cautious about simply dismissing the school," Sayer said. In some instances, dismissing a large amount of students can be more dangerous than keeping them in school, he added.

"As we considered and weighed this, we were conscious of the anxiety levels of students and parents and how they must feel [in the wake] of Colorado," said Sayer. "We felt we needed to act with extreme caution."

Amherst Police Sergeant Scott Livingstone said the incident in Colorado and the recent nationwide rash of bomb threats were "obviously on our mind" when deciding how to respond to the threat, but they were not the primary reasons the school was evacuated and no extra precautions were taken.

The police department made a "clean sweep" of the building, according to Sgt. Livingstone. After visually searching the building, police sent in canine units. No bombs were found.

"There are probably a million of these calls every year across the country," Sayer said. "Probably almost a million are pranks. But we treat them seriously."

Amherst Police detectives are "following leads," according to Sgt. Livingstone, to trace the origin of the call. Sayer said he would like to participate in the prosecution process of anyone charged in relation to the threat.

"One of the most serious crimes that one can commit is to put the safety of 2,000 students at risk," he said.

Student safety has been the focus of discussion at both schools since students returned from vacation this Monday.

"We [faculty and administrators] knew that coming

University protestors totalling 60 take admissions battle to Boston

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — University of Massachusetts students, organized by the Task-force for Equal Opportunity and Access, left campus yesterday morning to make their voices heard to higher-ups in Boston.

The group of about 60 students, loaded into two buses, took their concerns on revisions to the UMass admissions policy right to the doorstep of the State House.

Although the protestors had planned to walk from Park Street to Beacon Street where President William Bulger's office is, they found that it was not possible without a park permit which they did not have. Instead, protestors stayed in front of the State House where their recognition came in the form of Senator Dianne Wilkerson.

Just getting out from a committee meeting, Wilkerson came outside to address the crowd. "This is important," she began, "you can't appreciate how important it is to see folks come to the building they own. This is your State House, you're in the right place." She then talked about her own experiences growing up in Springfield, Mass., and going on to law school at Boston College.

"I was an Affirmative Action student. If they had looked at my application I would have never been admitted because I didn't live the life. Well, I graduated in the top 20 percent of my class. I knew I could do the work. Some people still don't recognize the importance of an educated citizenry." Wilkerson also spoke about the importance of voting. "We're very opinionated people, well they don't count opinions they count votes. They don't expect students to follow up and vote. It only counts at election time. I sit in the seat but I don't own the seat, the people do." Voting registration forms were passed out afterwards.

Although the turnout was not as good as expected by the task-force, which predicted about 1,000 students, they claim this trip was only the beginning of bigger things to come.

"Our presence was heard today. We lobbied our state rep's concerning the issues and we requested a meeting with the Board of Higher Education. Political officials know we're out here and that helps them support us more effectively. This is only the beginning," said Monica Chierici, sophmore social thought and political economy major and an organizer of the protest.

Aside from Sen. Wilkerson's appearance, most of the rally was composed of poems and speeches from professionals. Monty Neill, the director of Fair Tests, a non-profit organization that researches standardized testing, spoke first. He spoke about the inequality in education among high school students and about what the government is trying to do.

"They want to let people in by merit. What is merit? We want to give more benefits to the people that are smart enough to be born to rich people. They use SATs and it is a weak predictor of how student will do at school. Richer means higher scores," Neill said.

Ruth Kietson Roberts, an English professor at Roxbury Community College spoke to the crowd as well. "They don't want to waste their time educating people they don't have jobs for, so it is easier to keep them out of school. i think this student activism is wonderful. It's very hard to get stu-

While some students and faculty went to Boston to voice their beliefs about affirmative action yesterday, other University of Massachusetts campus members attended a lecture on the issue from an alumna, known for her advocacy for people of color and women.

Johnetta B. Cole, shared her "passion about the subject of affirmative action" with the crowded Bartlett auditorium, emphasizing how much of a necessity she feels it is.

"Affirmative action is about inequality and the power relations that govern our society. Affirmative action, although not a perfect instrument, has been a crucial instrument."

Invited to speak by the UMass Alumni Association, in honor of their Eleanor Bateman Alumni Scholar in Residence award, Cole was a professor and associate provost at UMass before moving on to become the first African- American woman to head the all black Spelman College.

Cole was also welcomed by Chancellor David K. Scott, who presented her with the award.

Scott, who made the recent revision to admissions policy, causing protests from some students, said of Cole's speech, "it was very inspirational, very sobering... she was a clear, clear voice amongst a lot of confusion."

Although Cole made it clear she was not going to comment on the university's admissions policy, she did say she has had conversations with "brother Chancellor." Cole also took a moment to say that she hoped the chancellor would remember "that he and I are supposed to share the same vision."

Citing examples of racism nationwide, from an incident at a Denny's restaurant to the recent Colorado high school shooting, Cole pointed to affirmative action as the means to correcting inequality in a society still faced with racism.

When Sally Davis, a UMass employee, asked Cole if she has seen much action around affirmative action on college campuses, Cole said "I don't see enough."

Continuing on this vein, Cole emphasized the need to diversify learning communities and "find a way to make differences, not such a difference."

Cole is currently a Presidential Distinguished Professor of anthropology, women's studies and African American studies at Emory University.

Following her speech, Cole met with those in attendance — many of whom were friends — to sign her most recent book, "Dream the Boldest Dreams: And Other Lessons of Life."

During the reception, senior anthropology major Ciara Bowley said of Cole,"The way she carries herself, the way she speaks. She was an inspiration to me. I really think I want to major in anthropology because of her."

"It was direct and to the point, it got into the deep aspects of affirmative action..." said Logan Bailey-Perkins, a junior Afro-American and political science major.

Professor of Afro-American studies, John Bracey, who team-taught with Cole dating back to the 70s, said of Cole, "She's dynamite, she's always dynamite. It would be helpful if our chancellor would do the same. There's a necessity to have a diverse student body... in order to educate everyone properly."

Pedestrian safety an SGA goal

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Among the motions passed at last night's University of Massachusetts Student Government Association meeting was a motion to heighten the awareness of pedestrian safety on campus.

Senator Mark Boniface (commuter area) spoke about the need for educating pedestrians, following the two recent fatal accidents.

"We all know about the two deaths and how tragic that was. There's been proposals — such as speed bumps, but I don't necessarily think the problem is the drivers. I think it's the pedestrians," he said.

Boniface talked about how pedestrians often walk out into the middle of the road when it may be difficult for a car to stop in time. Additionally, many students don't use the crosswalks, he said.

"My mom told me when I was five to look both ways before you cross the street. That is probably why I am here today," Boniface said.

The motion, which was co-written by Senator Greg Ng (Northeast) included a call to create radio public service announcements advocating that drivers be more alert approaching crosswalks, distribute pedestrian fliers to all students, explain the importance of pedestrian safety through RA presentations, and recognize a specific day as "Pedestrian Safety Day."

Other motions passed included a motion to make excess checks from the Bursar's Office available to students on payment plans if their payments are up to date.

Senator Jennifer Worcester (Orchard Hill) recalled a personal experience she had recently.

"There was a thousand dollar excess check waiting for me and they said 'no,'" she said.

Worcester was ahead of her tuition payments, and saw no reason the for the University to withhold her money.

Seth Avakian, student trustee added that if the excess check is more than the student owes, the University should let them use it towards tuition.

Another motion passed that granted the student programming board to give $3,200 to SGA for its summer leadership conference.

Senator Paul Ferro (commuter area) argued that the board's money should be used for programming accessible to all students.

"I don't think it's justifiable. Two-hundred students out of 18,000 will go to this conference," he said, "[the programming board] is not a slush fund. It's not there to be spent willy-willy."

NATO attacks near their goal of submission

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — With NATO perceiving signs of growing dissent in Yugoslavia, Slobodan Milosevic's regime fired a deputy premier yesterday who suggested Belgrade was ready to accept key NATO demands for ending the crippling air campaign.

Vuk Draskovic, a former Yugoslav opposition leader who in recent days had called for a compromise with NATO, was dismissed because of "public statements which were contrary to the government stands," the state-run Tanjug news agency said.

Speaking after his ouster, the 52-year-old Draskovic (pronounced DRASH'-koh-vitch) said: "I don't know what precipitated my removal. I haven't spoken to Milosevic."

The firing came the same day that NATO said it was seeing signs of serious discontent inside Yugoslavia. Draskovic had said the Yugoslav leadership should stop lying to its people about the situation in the country after weeks of bombings and recognize "we cannot defeat NATO."

Draskovic, however, is the only official who has spoken out against the regime during the airstrikes, and his firing cast doubts about any significant weakening in the government.

A NATO official speaking on condition of anonymity called the move "the first visible fracture" in the Yugoslav leadership, NATO spokesman Jamie Shea said people such as Draskovic are starting to speak out against Milosevic's policies, publicly blaming Belgrade for the NATO attacks and calling for political change.

But Draskovic, a maverick who joined the government only in January, sounded a nationalistic tone after his dismissal and denied any rift.

"Maybe some people in the West believed that I could be the man of tomorrow with whom NATO could cooperate," he said. "No! NATO is the aggressor... We are victims of this blind revenge against a whole nation."

A Serb opposition leader, Zoran Djindjic, told Austrian television that Draskovic had no real clout in the government and his dismissal is "no way a sign of a rift in the Yugoslav government."

In Washington, President Clinton was noncommittal over the level of discontent in Belgrade. "We have some indications that there are differences of opinion, obviously, developing in Belgrade," he said. "There are some things we know I should not comment on." Also in Washington, the House of Representatives voted to require Clinton to get congressional approval before deciding to inject "ground elements" into the Kosovo conflict.

Car jacking attempt halted by police

University of Massachusetts police responded to several 911 calls late yesterday morning reporting a suspicious person on Eastman Lane who had climbed a tree and was yelling obscenities at vehicles and people passing by.

The man, later identified as George Starling, was dressed completely in black, witnesses said. He later began to jump onto vehicles, and kicked out the windshield of a car with an elderly man trapped inside in an apparent car jacking attempt, police reports said.

The first officer who arrived on the scene requested additional police officers. After a "long struggle," Starling, 28, of 83L Nicholas Rd., Framingham, was arrested.

He is being charged with destruction of property, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, assault and battery, resisting arrest, disorderly conduct, assault and battery on a police officer and attempt to commit a crime (car jacking).

Police were unable to comment about Starling's mental condition at the time of the incident, or whether drugs or alcohol were involved.

But the investigation continued last night as a number of police officers conducted a two-hour search for a backpack Starling had abandoned in the area between Sylvan Residential Area and the equestrian trails along Eastman Lane.

According to UMass Chief of Police John Luippold, during questioning, Starling "expressed concern" about a backpack he had left in the area. "Considering the nature of the charges, we got up here as soon as we could," Luippold said.

The operator of the motor vehicle was transported to University Health Services to receive treatment for cuts to his face. Officer Robert Waskiewicz was also treated at Health Services for an injury to his arm; he has since returned to work.

Privatization protested at Campus Center

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Students and staff of the University of Massachusetts marched through the Campus Center and the Student Union yesterday, protesting the university's recent decision to consider privatizing campus services.

The "Solidarity March" began on the steps of the Student Union, where speakers assailed university administrators for hiring consulting groups to help them determine the profitability of privatizing on-campus businesses.

"The UMass administration has been attempting to screw the unions and the students on this campus," said graduate student Dave Hammer, who led the rally. "We're marching to represent the solidarity that unions have against the oppression of the administration."

"If you look at affirmative action, you see connections to privatization," Hammer continued. "If you look at privatization, you see connections to funding cuts for the library. If you look at the library, you see connections to getting rid of professors."

Francis Martin, a representative of the American Federation of State and County Employees (AFSCME), tried to convince the crowd that privatization would be detrimental to the services offered on campus.

"At Holyoke Community College [where campus businesses have been privatized], you can't get anything to eat at 1:30 in the afternoon," he said.

At the conclusion of Hammer and Martin's speeches, the participants, consisting mostly of Graduate Student Senators and members of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), marched into the Student Union, chanting, "The workers united can not be defeated!" As they entered the Hatch Food Court and the Bluewall Cafe, their message changed to "Hey, hey! Ho, ho! McDonald's has got to go!"

While many of the students present at the eateries at the time of the rally seemed indifferent to the protest, many others expressed support for the anti-privatization movement.

"I've always worked for small, local businesses, and I've dents out, but you have the power to change things. We need jobs, education and access for all," said Roberts.

Remon Jourdan and Shaggy Flores read poems. Joyce Whitedeer Vincent the coordinator of Native American Culture also spoke. "This nation was made off the backs of my people. Separate but equal, we did not get equal because our schools are not funded equally," said Vincent.

Amherst's State Representative D-Ellen Story, did not address the protestors, but when asked she said, "Our feeling is that the chancellor is doing the best he can with the issue. It is in the courts. I think he was trying to prevent a law suit. He didn't eliminate race, that is not the case, but it was handled very poorly by the administration."

All of the speakers had an effect on the high school students, who turned out to show their support.

Shante Sylvan a 17-year-old college-bound student from Boston expressed his feelings on which colleges he'll apply to. "If I felt it was a waste of my time and there was only a 10 percent chance of me getting in, I won't bother applying."

Langston Peace, a 16-year-old junior that attends Boston Latin school — where the now well-known affirmative action decision came out of — said, "What the students are doing is necessary. Nobody talks about it at my school. After they pass this with other states, no blacks will get in to college, and it affects me because I was thinking about applying to UMass."

Some students carry torch; protest in Boston for others

News Analysis

By Lenny Holston
Collegian Staff

Boston — Warm spring days towards the end of the semester are usually a time when University of Massachusetts students relax, cut class and look forward to the summer. This was not the case on Wednesday for two busloads of students and faculty working to keep affirmative action at the university.

As the buses, blaring music from a DJ Clue mixtape and Jam'n 94.5, set out for the State House in Boston, there was an inescapable feeling among the crowd that this was a fight for life or death for everyone on board.

While practically all of the women and minorities on campus chose to do other things, this diverse yet small fraction of UMass, fought with everything they had yesterday.

What gives this side of the equal access debate so much passion for the protestors is what they describe as the underlying sense that they are doing this for others. Rafael "Shaggy" Flores, a member of Gamma Phi Sigma, the first Latino Fraternity at Umass, says that he continues to fight for equal access because "two or three of my younger brothers want to attend UMass but their chances are slim because of [the change in policy]."

"This is an incredibly important issue. People are not being allowed into the university," said Anna Cohen Cole, a freshman linguistics/anthropology major from Atlanta, Georgia. "Minorities who grew up in the inner cities did not have the same opportunities and now they are being screwed. I am not in any particular group, I represent everyone [at UMass]," she added.

In her her keynote address, State Senator Dianne Wilkerson, applauded the efforts of the protestors. "I am glad you are here at the State House, which is a house for the entire state. These doors stay open 24-hours a day and you are always welcomed here."

No stranger to the cause Wilkerson proclaimed that she is "a proud benefactor of affirmative action. I ended up graduating in the top 20 percent of my law school."

Even with the lack of support from white women on campus, who, studies are finding, have benefitted from affirmative action more than any other group, and from the university's minorities, the state house rally further galvanized an energetic core of activists.

But student apathy does indeed threaten to defeat the movement. "The administration does not respond well to protest," confides Amherst's state representative, Ellen Story who has traditionally been a very strong supporter of affirmative action. "The [state] legislature is not sympathetic to the cause, either."

always found they're more responsive to my needs as an employee and to the customers," said Jessica Lamson, a sophomore Family and Consumer Studies Education major. "I don't think the university should privatize."

The rally was held on Worker's Memorial Day, which honors laborers killed in the line of work.

"At [the university], people aren't dying on the job, but the administration could give two rats' asses about us anyway," said Hammer.

While virtually all of the protestors were students, six unions were represented in the protest — including the UMass faculty union, the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP).

"I think privatization is a bad idea," said MSP President Jenny Spencer, an English professor. "It's not appropriate for a campus situation. I think students would lose jobs."

"I think we all know that big companies have very little regard for anything but bottom-line profits," she added.

back to school Monday could be a difficult transition for our students and our staff," Sayer said. "We decided we needed to offer students a chance to talk about this."

The principal of each school addressed students about the Colorado shootings either in writing or over the intercom system, Sayer said. In addition, many teachers devoted class time to talk about the incident.

Discussion has also extended throughout the community. Prior to the Colorado incident, a proposal to station a police officer in Amherst Regional High School was debated among school staff members and local residents.

A survey distributed last month to 170 teachers and staff members indicated that an overwhelming majority (78 percent) support the proposal. But, according to an April 23 Daily Hampshire Gazette article, many local residents who attended a public forum two weeks ago voiced concerns that the presence of police officers in the school would have a negative effect on minority students.

The Amherst-Pelham Regional School Committee will likely vote on the proposal in late May, the Gazette article further stated. If approved, the officer will begin working in the school next fall. Sayer said yesterday that they "would not be doing anything different" in light of the recent incident.

A group of Amherst College students are also responding to the Colorado killings through sympathy letters to Columbine students, faculty and staff.

"It's a gesture," Amherst College senior Beth Fascitelli said in a press release, "a simple act of kindness that may help us feel more connected. I hope it helps play a small part in supporting and extending sympathy to the people at Columbine."

The letter-writing effort will take place tomorrow from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Amherst College Keefe Campus Center.

REDUCE REUSE RECYCLE

Amerherst town meeting begins

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — With plenty of debate and a few surprises, Town Meeting began last night in the same place where a bomb threat was made earlier in the day.

The auditorium of the Amherst Pelham Regional Middle School was relatively subdued as the first several articles passed, but a surprise came during the approval of the Human Resources/Human Rights section of the operating budget.

Town Meeting member Vince O'Connor made a motion to cut the position of human rights director from full-time to part-time. He said several years ago the position was part- time and Town Manager Barry Del Castilho hired someone for the position full-time, and then went to Town Meeting seeking the additional funding for the full-time position.

O'Connor said he was not against Affirmative Action, but the job had not proved busy enough to be full-time.

Finance Committee Chairperson Alice Carlozzi defended Del Castilho's decision to make the position full-time.

"Our town manager [has a] commitment to diversity and inclusion. I believe he has a very sincere, heartfelt commitment to this for that reason," she said.

Select Board Chairperson Bryan Harvey said the issue should have been discussed with the Select Board and others, before the 250 member Town Meeting.

"At least discuss the implications this would have rather than have to try to have a conversation [in Town Meeting]," Harvey said.

Del Castilho said originally Epi Bodhi had been the human rights director and health director and there was "too much going on...to remain a part-time position any longer." So he made the position full-time but told the person hired that it may not be funded as full-time by Town Meeting.

The issue comes with a recent backdrop of controversy involving Shenandoah Titus, the current human rights director.

Del Castilho had to play mediator between Titus and the Amherst Police Department earlier this year when a conflict arose after police would not let Titus speak to officers involved in a complaint Titus was investigating. Fuel was added to the fire when Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia was quoted in the Daily Hampshire Gazette calling the Civil Rights Review Commission a "kangaroo court." Titus, as the human rights director, is head of the commission.

O'Connor said after the position was made full-time he was willing to wait and see how it went but has since come to believe "things have not worked out well."

Select Board member Jill Boss, citing two other articles to come before Town Meeting concerning human rights in Tibet and Nigeria, said supporting this change would send the wrong message.

"Could you see the headline, 'Town Meeting supports human rights in Tibet, Town Meeting supports human rights in Nigeria but doesn't support human rights in Amherst,'" Boss said.

The motion failed with 56 votes for and 120 against.

Approval of the Public Works section of the operating budget turned into a discussion of the timely issue of crosswalks and pedestrian safety.

Noah Ryan, superintendent of Public Works, said keeping crosswalks visible is difficult.

"We have had a lot of problems with paint on sidewalk crossings. The kind of paint required by the EPA to use is not as [permanent] as lead based paint. It doesn't last a whole year," Ryan said.

He said he has allowed in the budget for crosswalks in the downtown business district to be painted twice a year but not outlying crosswalks.

With the approval of the various budgets a staple of Town Meeting, Carlozzi reminded the group what the bottom line should be during the several weeks long process.

She requested the Meeting members remember the budget is tight and passing small requests for funding along the way can add up.

"If we were allowed to print our own money the way we can handle our foreign policy then none of this would matter," Carlozzi said.

Town Meeting continues today at 7:30 p.m. in the Amherst Pelham Regional Middle School Auditorium.

Since Victorian times, women have suffered from a lack of education about their own bodies and reproductive systems. Back then, a "hysterical" woman might be forced to have a hysterectomy. Women's bodies were misunderstood. Today, we know more, and we have reproductive choices.

Tanya Mannes

We are liberated by easy–to–use information systems that inform us of such choices. In the April 15, 1999 Valley Advocate, Michael Learmonth writes about "cuddly" technology: "American culture is still searching for how the personal computer, and technology in general, plugs into daily life." The iMac, one example, can be used without a manual, making it easy for novices to access the Internet.

A few years ago, if the condom broke, you prayed for a miracle. Today, a click of the mouse brings you to Princeton University's Office of Population Research web site.

"A few years ago, if the condom broke, you prayed for a miracle. Today, a click of the mouse brings you to Princeton University's Office of Population Research web site."

The disclaimer: "All forms of emergency contraception described on this server require a prescription. Do not attempt to use them except under the supervision of a licensed clinician authorized to prescribe." The well–designed site is a comprehensive look at the "morning–after pill," a legal and "remarkably safe and effective" (according to the FDA), way to prevent pregnancy within 72 hours after intercourse.

The site has photos of contraceptive pill brands, and a guide to dosages of three or more pills that act as an emergency contraceptive. Despite the disclaimer, women can use the guide to seek, not prescribe — bypassing outdated laws that force them to seek out and pay a doctor for a prescription. This information was once difficult to access. No major pharmaceutical company markets or advertises emergency contraception.

Many authority figures would still limit access to this sort of knowledge, as well as access to other forms of contraception and abortion. The American Civil Liberties Union's (ACLU) Web page reports the House's determination to deny teens access to reproductive health services at Title X clinics. "One of the intentions ... was to limit the use of emergency contraception, a key advance in controlling teen pregnancy rates."

The ACLU also expects the Religious Right in the 106th Congress to fight for the "Teen Endangerment Act." Two bills under that name would allow for the prosecution of anyone other than a parent who transports a minor across state lines for an abortion.

The Princeton site and the ACLU site are examples of a revolution in women's reproductive rights, facilitated by interfaces that make information accessible. The April/May '99 Ms. magazine is a forum similar to such sites in content and funding. Ms. has never accepted paid advertisements, so its reporting has been one of the most unbiased sources for women's issues. A group of investors recently bought Ms. for a reported $3 million, so that it is once again "women–owned. The cover says, "Wake up and smell the estrogen!"

The new Ms. editor, Marcia Gillespie, writes about the magazine's "fresh new look," supposedly less formidable, more user–friendly. But although the updated Ms. is still a force of change, it is being absorbed into many alternative data sources for women. This is a good thing. During the final months of negotiation and then the sale of Ms., publication was suspended, an example of how easy it would be to suppress any printed publication.

In an article in Ms., "There's Got to Be a Morning After," Debbie Stoller discusses "America's best–kept secret." Even 10 years ago, Ms. would have been the authority on it, but Stoller concedes that there is a "wealth of information on the Web." User–friendly interfaces help women of all abilities take control of their reproductive rights.

Letters to the Editor

Article wrongly implied hazing

To the editor:

I would like to respond to a Collegian article published this Tuesday which took words spoken by myself and other members of Pi Lambda Phi fraternity out of the context in which they were spoken. Names and quotes from members of Pi Lambda Phi were utilized in reference to another incident involving another Greek organization. The quotes falsely construe that the fraternity stated uses an example of hazing, which was not stated by any member of Pi Lambda Phi fraternity. Conversations about the general issue of hazing were utilized in such a way that was inaccurate and unprofessional. Future articles in the Collegian might try and do a better job at depicting news and views accurately.

Collegian reported only Extravaganja arrests

To the editor:

Inspired as we were to write a letter in response to the Collegian's article about Extravaganja, we though (sic) we might start it, "Marked as much by inaccuracies and typos as actual news, the (sic) over 10,000 people read the Collegian everyday (sic)." The article concentrated (75%) on arrests and what went wrong. If an actor stumbles over one line in a play, the entire review would not be about that stumble. We believe that the Cannabis Reform Coalition's (CRC) Extravaganja deserves the same courtesy.

There were also a number of inaccuracies reported. Obviously, much of the information gathered was hearsay. Not a single CRC officer was interviewed or quoted. The MC, Mycho Jellison, was quoted out of context: "we are only here to break one law." This was stated in the aftermath of a near riot, and was to urge the crowd not to interfere with arrests. Civil disobedience can be exciting, but concentrating on such happenings ignores the important issues.

Marijuana legalization, and even decriminalization, is a serious issue. The laws as they exist today cause national morale problems, divide communities and families, destroy lives, and diminish the greatness of our nation. The recently passed Higher Education Act (ignored by the Collegian) now denies anyone with a drug conviction access to Federal Financial Aid. A national campaign against this is forming now, with the backing of the NAACP and the National Association of Students.

Extravaganja embodies a political, yet hardly radical, sentiment regarding today's laws. Many people involved in the movement do not smoke marijuana, and may never (including the CRC secretary). Millions in this country believe the laws need to be changed. The movement is supported by reformers from all sides, including civil libertarians, minority advocates, and health practitioners.

Extravaganja is about reform, and about people having a good time sharing each other's company. That was what happened. People will look back on Extravaganja '99 and remember music, food, and good times, as well as Derek Trucks (now with the Allman Brothers) playing with Electric Blue and Kosmik Truth. Hopefully the Collegian will do its readers the service of full and comprehensive reporting on such events, in the future.

You've been tricked!

I can't handle writing these columns anymore without exposing the biggest fraud UMass has ever seen. I thought that I would be strong enough to keep this secret, but it is eating at me. I don't know what kind of repercussions this announcement will have here in Amherst, but I know that it is my public duty to bestow this news upon all of you. I can't promise that after you read this you will still want to read this paper, go to graduation or even want to live.

Dan Viens

Here is the earth–shattering news. Ever since last September you have been fooled each and every Thursday, thinking that you have read one of Dan Viens' columns. He is not the true author of these columns. Each week he has been giving me $12.75 and doing one load of my laundry. In exchange I have been writing a true column that he has been passing off to you as his own. Dan Viens is the Milli Vanilli of UMass and I, Roberto Sandoval, am prepared to expose him for the liar he is.

Let me start by telling you how Viens and I met. During the fall semester of this year Viens was repeating Freshman writing for the fourth time and I was taking it for the first. We happened to sit right across from each other. Our old–school teacher had a seating chart. Therefore Mr. Viens and I, Roberto Sandoval, had to sit directly across from each other every Monday, Wednesday and Friday. Dan seemed to be an OK kid, but he was quite possibly the worst writer that it had been my misfortune to stumble upon. Everyone in our class thought he was joking when he brought in his first paper — "Me and My Puppy." However, when he brought in his next two papers called "My Puppy and Me" and "My Neighbor and Her Puppy," we all realized that he was an incredibly deficient writer. I, on the other hand, am a natural writer. I find it easy to channel humor through my pen.

Mr. Viens and I would often proofread each other's essays. He would laugh hysterically at mine and in appreciation I would pity his writing and try to help him. Unfortunately this help was to no avail. All I can say is that Dan Viens' writing ability was and is a lost cause.

It is important to understand that what Viens lacks in writing skill he makes up for in his bank account. For Christmas, he bought his girlfriend two Mustangs. One was a 1999 Ford and the other was a real horse. He even bought himself a role in the UMass Theater production of "The Mandrake" (which will be performed daily at six in Durfee Gardens for free, starting tonight). The show is free because Viens gave the theater department a ton of money.

After Dan read a couple of my essays he came up with a scheme where I would get some money and clean clothes (luxuries in my home village of Pocodin Ero, Mexico), and he would be known all over campus as a funny writer. He was desperate to have his name and face in New England's largest college daily each week. I decided to do it because he was going to give me so much money.

However, just recently I have found out that $12.75 is not equivalent to one billion pesos like Dan Viens told me. Also, I have noticed that there are hundreds of washers and dryers on campus, not the mere one per state that he told me there was. I was shocked, appalled and ashamed that I sold my soul for such a petty amount. Because of this, I have decided to expose this boy for the Evil Enigma he is. From now on I will be writing articles under my own name (though I may use Dan's picture because he's awful good lookin').

Write for Ed/Op!

It's a dirty job...

Oh, the lowly life of an underpaid bus–boy.

For the past three months, I've windexed tables and picked up crumbs and random trash as a bus–boy for the patrons of the Hatch. Not what you call slave labor, just easy money. I like the job. Good people. No hassles. But there's one thing I've noticed during my short, two–hour shifts — UMass, you are some creative slobs!

I know the Hatch is not an upscale French cabaret, or even a "No shirt, no shoes, no service" establishment. It's more like a glorified dining commons with less nose hair and no country–fried steak (sorry). Hell, you can eat with your elbows on the table, mouth wide open — no one cares.

I'm employed at the Hatch to clean up messes and regulate tray circulation, but it's not about my job responsibilities: it's about the disgusting trash–heap creations people leave!

A few crumbs here, a napkin there, or even an occasional soda spill — not a problem, just routine duty. It's these "creations" I have to clean up.

Nothing pleases me more than a table smothered in a ketchup and mayonnaise mixture with napkins strategically smushed into a brown steamy tower of French fries and taco shells draped with split pink lemonade that covers the entire mound of quivering mush (mmm, beefy).

Impressive. I mean, what are you people doing enrolled at UMass? You should be working for NASA or writing greeting cards with all that creative knowledge.

Imagine my excitement every time I approach these "special" tables. It's like a Christmas condiment morning and all the gifts are left for me (to clean up).

Joy to the friggin' world.

I can envision our classmates (and even professors) sculpting these morsel mountains with glazed, possessed eyes, caressing the shapes, whispering to themselves, "This means something."

Hey, Picasso, the craft center is across the hall. This is a cafeteria... and remember to wipe the drool off the side of your mouth before you leave.

Better idea: frame these half–consumed food piles, now "fine art," and sell those bad–boys. Some freak–show in Northampton will buy them. But before you do, I have to know one thing: are you eating burgers and fries, or a plate full of pyschedelic mushrooms? Your meals are ending up like Salvador Dali renditions.

Honestly, I have to admit — these inventions are pure comedy. They are often so tall I can hide under their shadows for a five minute Coke break. Standing before these mashed monuments, I don't know whether to cup my hands and pray, or destroy these edible effigies. Who or what are you paying homage to anyway?

Sometimes I think I'm cleaning up after an all day pie eating contest (think Stand by Me). People, untie your hands, wash your face, and grab some utensils. They're up front. They're plastic, but they do the job, OK Lardass?

But when I'm through laughing to myself, I'm faced with a problem. How am I going to attack these monsters? There are some potential dangers, I mean, a rabid relish creature could charge out swinging half–eaten chicken bones and try to spit kidney beans and hot dog–ends into my eyes. I probably would apply a quick headlock to surprise it and then slay it with my trusty sword, uh, windex.

I gotta think like John McClane, for God's sake, to survive this minimum wage dead–end. He may have fought off international terrorists, but I have to stare down the eyes of leftover mixtures of the Bread and Bowl! And I do it all with my shoes on.

(sigh) A holstered windex bottle marks the end of the day's battles. Two hours of dismantling my fellow UMass classmates' construction+ are enough for this underpaid bus– boy. But rest up, creative slobs, for tomorrow a clean table awaits.

And I'll be ready.

No nukes

Modernized nations all over the world should work towards the elimination of nuclear power plants and the development of safer, cleaner energy production. If we consider both the long and short–term effects of concentrating heavy metals such as uranium, nuclear power is by far the most polluting form of power generation. Nuclear power generation in the case of a meltdown has the potential to contaminate on a global level. However, there are no international laws regulating the safety of plants, so precautionary measures are left to individual countries.

Arieh Kurinsky

A nuclear power plant, unlike a petroleum power plant does not emit harmful gases into the atmosphere on a regular basis. During certain routine procedures, nuclear power plants must employ the use of petroleum–based fuels. In addition, all the water used to cool the reactor becomes radioactive, polluting whatever body of water is nearby. Radioactive lakes and rivers are very harmful to local communities.

There are several long–term public safety issues involved with nuclear reactors. The fuel rods used to power a nuclear reactor are among the most toxic substances known to human kind. First of all, these rods must be transported to the site where they are to be installed. In the recent past, there was an incident on I–91 involving a fuel–rod transport truck. The truck was overturned and the fuel rods were rendered useless. Useless rods are also created when their reactive potential is exhausted.

No one has suggested a solution for the disposal of the used or damaged fuel rods that is acceptable to everyone. Usually this substance, which will be radioactive for at least 150 years, is dumped on a rural community. In most cases, the community is strongly opposed to living near a uranium dump. Nevada, a state with no nuclear power, was recently chosen as a national disposal site. Containment of nuclear fuel waste is difficult under the best conditions, but what happens during an emergency?

A nuclear meltdown can be disastrous. When the Chernobyl reactor melted down, tons of radioactivity was spread all over Europe. The surrounding countries experienced the horrible effects of nuclear fallout for months after the meltdown. Crops and dairy products were rendered useless. children were kept inside and strange illnesses appeared. The long–term health effects of this disaster are still being discovered.

Chernobyl was a reactor which had not been well maintained and had improper safety precautions. The same claim has been made of plants just twenty miles away; they have been poorly maintained and are not capable of safely containing a melt down. This year is the twentieth anniversary of the near catastrophe at Three Mile Island, a plant whose meltdown would have directly affected the Northeast. So what can you do to help save your future?

It is imperative that we do not build any new nuclear power plants because even if we were to close all the plants in existence today, the daunting task of dismantling them remains. To say that there are not alternative ways to generate power is to overlook enormous potential of wind, solar and hydroelectric power. Many of these technologies have not been researched because of the strong lobbying power of the nuclear and petroleum industries. However, great progress has been made in the development of alternative energies, despite the opposition, and several realistic options now exist. What is desperately needed at this point is the active voice of the public to address this issue. Change does not happen by itself.

Student Run TV

The perfection of practice: the purpose of UVC

At the student–run television station at the University of Massachusetts, UVC–TV 19, a program is being run that most perfectly exemplifies the organization's reason for being.

"Mass Hysteria," now out of production, is broadcast in rerun form sporadically throughout the programming week.

When watching the original sketch comedy show from episode to episode, one might notice slight glitches in the editing, or discrepancies in the sound quality. Maybe one show the lighting will seem a little off, and perhaps the next show the lens focus won't quite be exact. Ironically, these flaws are precisely what makes "Mass Hysteria" a perfect UVC poster–boy show.

"It was really an attempt at figuring out television," current TV 19 President and "Hysteria" producer Josh Splansky said. "I really like comedy, I've done a lot of improv comedy in the past, and so I decided to do a sketch comedy show. I didn't know what I was doing, and we were figuring things out as we went along. And if you'd seen any episodes, [you'd see] it demonstrated that. On the first one, the video was bad, the audio was bad — there was a lot of excitement, but we didn't exactly know how to transfer that over to a complete show. By the end of the first semester, it was a lot better."

Seth Koenig

If you ask anyone involved with UVC–TV 19, you will find that what makes it onto the screen everyday is less than perfect. But that's just what the station heads count on.

"Our primary role is as an educational facility and to help in learning how to produce television and how to produce it through several types and genres, like news and documentaries," station vice president Shawn Downs said.

In fact, all of the programs that are displayed on chanel No. 19 on the UMass campus are learning experiences. None are run by George Lucas or Mel Gibson... but Lucas and Gibson had to start somewhere.

On a day–to–day basis, aspiring producers and directors put long hours into the creation and airing of a number of different shows, from hard news to hip hop.

"From a scheduling point of view, we just try to get a nice broad spread of shows," UVC program director Todd Higgins said. "Every show we have here is educational in some form or another. We've done a lot of documentaries and a lot of public affairs shows — and then we try to break it up with shows like 'Mass Hysteria.' The whole point is to ensure that when people work hard on a program, it gets on the air."

And when people work hard on a program, as much of a "learning experience" as it is, UVC will find some gems.

Perhaps unnoticed by much of the UMass population, many TV 19 originals are more than sufficiently entertaining.

A smattering of some of the best of the UVC products:

Sportsweekly (Thursday, Friday at 7:30 p.m.) — This program, a brainchild of sports director Jessica Johnson, features the brightest stars of the campus' athletic community in brain–busting interviews.

Get your hands on hands–on experience

If you're tired of sitting in classes just listening to professors lecture, if you're looking for some way to unleash your creative energies, or if you just love being on TV, well, stop complaining and watching endless episodes of "Judge Judy" and get down to the lower floor of the Student Union.

Television these days is still in its toddler stages, growing faster and faster as the technology advances. Job opportunities are increasing but getting all the more competitive. Hands–on experience is the only way to get a step ahead.

And at UMass, there is no better place for hands–on experience and creative opportunity than at UVC–TV 19, UMass' only student run television station.

Bryan McAllister

"It doesn't make a difference how much academic experience you have," said UVC president Josh Splansky. "You have to actually do it, get hands–on experience, make a lot of mistakes first. If people want to get involved, it's so easy. Just come down and sign up... There's room for new programs, new people and new ideas."

Splansky is also concerned with the perception of UVC on campus.

"A lot of people don't know where we are and whether we exist," said Splansky. "They think we're part of Housing Services Cable Network, or only for TV/Communication majors, or that we're [located] by WMUA and The Collegian."

The quality of the programming has also come under fire, but Splanksy explains that this is due simply to UVC's mission and goals. Mainly, they are a training facility, and new and often inexperienced members arrive and leave sporadically. Experimentation is key in this kind of atmosphere.

"We're not looking to make it look like 'NBC Nightly News'," said Splansky. "We're out here to train people to do TV in any way... We're really open for anyone who really wants to learn anything about television."

Learning just got a bit more exciting for UVC with the arrival of a Media 100 XS digital editing system, an advanced, user–friendly and computer operated editing facility which UVC spent most of the year trying to purchase. The money was funded by the SGA, and UVC did a lot of research into which one they would purchase and put in bids for. The result was an editing system comparable to the industry standard.

"It's like a word processor," said Splansky. "You don't like a sentence, then you can change a comma there or a word here. You can do dissolves, wipes, credits, effects."

The editing system is now mainly being used by graduating seniors already familiar with editing and productions. The first production using the system is Splansky's own Passed Tense, a short video movie shot in the beginning of this semester. The movie will be shown on May 13 in the Campus Center.

UVC also recently completed their elections for next year. Jessica Johnson will take over as president, Shawn Downs was re–elected as vice–president, Cecily Selden will be treasurer

Film Society set to show The Beyond

A girl screaming is a frequent occurrence in The Beyond, showing tomorrow night at midnight in Herter Hall.

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

If you enjoy seeing "metal spikes hammered into human flesh, acid poured on helpless victims, tarantulas dining on a man's face and eyeballs being gouged out" then you must attend the University of Massachusetts Film Society's midnight screening of the classic Italian horror film The Beyond this Friday night.

The Beyond is the story of a New York woman, named Liza (Catriona MacColl), who inherits an old Victorian house in New Orleans that just happens to be built upon one of the "seven gateways to hell." Luckily for us, this means that there are plenty of zombies and oodles of gore to go around.

When her hired help begins to disappear, Liza begins to get suspicious. Although she is warned about the ensuing dangers that lurk in the house, Liza refuses to give up. Assisting Liza in her adventures is her strapping young buck, Dr. John (David Warbeck) who soon discovers that this gateway to hell was opened when a mob killed a warlock back in the 20's.

As quickly as the people disappear, the zombies (who can only be stopped by a bullet in the head) begin to appear — ready to feast on the living.

Directed in 1980 by the late Lucio Fulci, like the rest of his films, this one promises to be just as campy and cheesy. Fulci has been hailed as one of the premiere Italian directors of horror. He is said to have influenced American horror film directors including Wes Craven and George Romero.

Of his intention in the film, Fulci said, "What I wanted to get across was the idea that life is often really a terrible nightmare and that our only refuge is to remain in this world." You can judge for yourself.

The Film Society wants in advance that due to the shocking and violent nature of this film, it may be too intense for some viewers.

This Friday's screening promises to be a gut-wrenching experience — continuing in the tradition of and filled with all the charm of all of the other midnight cult-classics.

The screening will take place in 227 Herter Hall. Tickets are $4 in advance at Tix Unlimited in the Student Union and $5 at the door. Informational material taken from the New York Post, USA Today, Time Out New York and Newsday.

Musical theater ignited at AC

By Bryon McAllister
Collegian Staff

When Amherst College students Adam Roffman and Mario Rojas noticed that there was a lack of student-run musical theater at Amherst and in the area, they decided, unlike their more apathetic peers, to do something about it. Starting a student run organization involves a lot of time and negotiation, but the results pay off — Roffman and Rojas' theater group, Cabaret, will present their first musical this coming weekend. Once on This Island will unfold with a cast of 15, including many UMass students, on April 29 and May 2 at 8 p.m. and May 1 at 4 p.m. in the front room of the Amherst College Campus Center.

"Amherst College extracurricular theater has never really been organized," said Roffman, who's also the director of Island. "But there's a real thirst for it, particularly at Amherst. People have been talking about this kind of thing for years."

Last semester Roffman and Rojas applied for funding from the student government, intent on forming a group entirely devoted to musical theater.

"[The UMass Theatre Guild's] Little Shop of Horrors was really the only musical show around the area this semester," said Roffman. "This is one of the first groups devoted entirely to musicals."

Right now, the plans are to produce a musical every second semester, beginning with Once on This Island.

Island is the story of class struggles, of love and sacrifice. It's a parable based on real-life class struggles in Haiti between the peasants and the upper class.

A young girl, Ti-Moune (UMass sophomore Maria Boucher), challenges these class differences when she falls in love with Daniel (UMass junior Nick Adams), the son of the wealthiest couple on the island. Set against a powerful tribal dance and the schemes and advice of the gods, the play involves the question of whether to break tradi-

Weekend concerts bring Pat McGee and local bands to valley

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

This weekend features intimate performances by the Pat McGee Band and Mighty Purple, a festival that showcases bands from around the globe, and well over 100 emerging bands playing in the Northampton Music Festival.

Pat McGee Band
Thursday, April 29
MTV Online calls them "the most talented unsigned band in the nation," Billboard hails them as "East Coast college darling," and MTV features their music. They have opened for artists ranging from Jimmy Buffett to the Counting Crows. Who are they? The Pat McGee Band, and they will showcase their highly praised talents at Pearl Street in Northampton tonight.

In only the second time the Pat McGee Band came to Northampton, they packed Pearl Street without the support of mainstream airplay. Tonight, one of the hottest bands in the college music scene returns to the area for one of their final appearances before they become a major label artist.

Showtime is set for 8:30 p.m. tonight with Fighting Gravity opening. Tickets are available at the Northampton Box Office or by calling 1-800-THE-TICK.

Mighty Purple
Friday, April 30
Fresh off a stunning performance at the NEMO Showcase in Boston, which displays some of the top emerging artists in the country, Mighty Purple has been creating waves in the Northeast's jam-band circuit. This Friday night they carry their powerful, electric pop to the basement of Van Meter in support of their invigorating debut.

The band has been featured in Jam Bands, and for the fifth year in a row they were voted New Haven's #1 Pop Artist by the New Haven Advocate.

Promising UMass acts, Tave Hu and Joint Custody open. Tave Hu recently packed a bus to one of their gigs at the Commercial Street Cafe in Worcester, while Joint Custody just finished the recording of their follow-up album.

Doors open at 7:30 p.m. Friday night with tickets available at the door and costing $3 in Van Meter basement.

Local band Mighty Purple finds its way home at Van Meter this weekend.

Fill the Hill '99
Saturday, May 1
Featuring twelve bands on three stages and countless other activities, Orchard Hill and Central Area Governments have teamed up to bring an outrageous outdoor festival that should strike a fancy for any UMass student.

The main stage kicks off at 4:00 p.m. and presents the Seattle-based three-piece Living Daylights; Iggle the Handle, who saw time on last year's H.O.R.D.E. tour; Denmark sensation, LarryLand, who are hailed by the European Press as "rock as god must have created it," Boston's Hall's Corner Band that sells out the Middle East and Paradise; and Hartford's Rane, who are a jam-band on the rise.

The Orchard Hill local stage presents Joint Custody, Tave Hu, Hurricane Dave and Ruby Dune. The Central local stage showcases Tuscan Groove among two others.

The Collegian will preview this event in-depth in tomorrow's edition. Fill the Hill '99 is open to the public and starts at noon and ends at 10 p.m. The main stage is located on the Orchard Hill / Central basketball court.

Northampton Music Festival
All Weekend
The Northampton Music Festival hosted its kickoff party at the Words & Pictures Museum last night, but the music doesn't get started until tonight. The festival offers some really great bands performing throughout the weekend.

Hospital is an act to watch out for and sees action at the Bay State at 10 p.m., while at the Swing Cat, Humbert is on the stage at 11 p.m., with Three-Thirds of Cordelia's Dad, formerly Jo, playing the Swing Cat at midnight.

Friday night, The Maggies will play the Bay State at 11 p.m.

Saturday sees the dynamic Aloha Streamtrain at the Swing Cat at 11 p.m. with power-pop stars Mary's First taking the stage at midnight.

The sequel to the novel Get Shorty is titled Be Cool and all about managing the career of a musician. This act was based on the Pioneer Valley's very own, Stone Coyotes, and they will touch the Pearl Street stage on Sunday, May 2 at 9 p.m.

Day passes or individual tickets are available from the Northampton Box Office or by calling 1-800-THE-TICK.

Hall's Corner Band stops in the Valley this weekend.

tion and love or keep with tribal culture.

UMass students Matthew Parvis and Rob O'Brien are also featured in the cast, as the gods of water and death, respectively. The assistant director/stage manager is UMass freshman Rachel Edelman.

The choreography for Once on This Island is Amherst College junior Tamara Venit. Amherst sophomore Vanessa Torrez did the costume design. The lighting design was engineered by Amherst senior Josh Cohen.

Once on This Island is free of charge. Due to limited seating, it is suggested that you arrive 10-15 minutes prior so performance.

"'Sportsweekly' is a sports show where Mike Corey is our host, and he talks to a guest, like Joanie O'Brien, the [Massachusetts] women's basketball coach, for instance, or the football coach, Mark Whipple — Bruiser [Flint, men's basketball coach] is supposed to be on this week, and we've had Mike Babul come in, the forward for the basketball team and Todd Bankhead, the quarterback of the football team come in," Johnson said.

"Sportsweekly" also makes it a point to publicize some of the lesser known sports at UMass.

"We really cover a lot of sports. We're not just something that focuses on the ones that tend to get a lot of the attention," Splansky said. "[We cover] men's gymnastics, crew, softball, baseball and lacrosse — we try to get as much recognition to all the UMass sports that we can."

UVC TV-19 News (Monday–Friday, 5:00 p.m.) — Anchored by a rotating trio of UMass undergraduates Stacey Collins, Lisa Green and Samantha Poulten, this regularly broadcast show covers a number of local and campus stories, peppered with national issues.

"News is the only show that UVC always produces. In the office with active members," Splansky said. "UVC hires a news producer and a news director that are part of our staff."

The UVC News also has the benefit of a professional quality blue wall, used for, among other things, a backdrop for weather reporters, as well as licensed CNN file footage to compliment national and International news.

Put Out the Word (Tuesday, Thursday at 8:00 p.m.) — Ben Gilbarg, a.k.a. "First Born," created this rap/hip hop variety show with the intentions of extending the reach of the program indefinitely.

Gilbarg, like no other creative mind at UVC in recent memory, has made publicity a very high priority for "Put Out the Word."

The show features music videos and interviews with personalities from the urban scene, in effect, "putting out the word."

"Put Out the Word" is a program that has much of the same premise of a production named "Room 307," a popular show run by Chris Noel and Tyrone Tugwell that ended its five-year run — the longest ever by a UVC program — last semester.

In addition to the aforementioned programming, TV 19 will be introducing "The Topkat & Undadog Show" with Jesse Murphy and Marat Fikhman, an entertainment variety show expected to include comedy, interviews and pertinent focus segments. Splansky also hinted that there is an inkling in renewing the idea of some form of sketch comedy show, in the tradition of "Mass Hysteria."

Still, the achievements of this station are not limited to regular programs.

"We also serve as an outlet to other, very independent producers and directors, who do their own thing on film, and transfer it to video," Downs said. "Some of our programming does include the occasional independent works that are totally not UVC or UVC productions."

Both Splansky and Downs are in the processes of producing independent, feature-length pieces, adding to a long tradition of such undertakings.

Splansky's Passed Tense, a movie about seven college students who are friends as freshmen, but grow apart during the course of their years in school, is currently in the final stages of editing and will be shown on May 15 in the Campus Center to display what, to the UVC president, is much more than just a senior project.

Noise, Downs' feature-in-the-making, is slated to begin filming in the fall. The humorous 110 page script details the surreal parallels of reality and media, as the lives of two university radio personalities are translated into the broadcast of their show. The two main characters, along with a mutual friend, love and lose and love again, stumbling along the way in an ironically smooth manner that only Downs could achieve.

Earlier precedents, like "Happiness is a Warm Toaster," a one-shot sketch comedy production by Jeff Ahlis and Tim McKeon, paved the way for such serious works.

Keep one eye open, because someday you just might see these UVC-TV 19ers on the big screen — or little screen — someday.

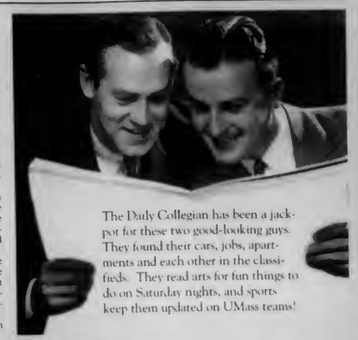
and Olivia Blanco takes over secretarial duties.

The new officers will take over where the former ones left off, furthering new and returning programming like "Sportsweekly", the news show, and sketch comedy. The sports coverage in particular has flourished this past year, and Bruiser Flint makes an appearance on "Sportsweekly" tonight.

In addition to recruiting new members, newly elected president Johnson intends to focus on making programming easier and more professional.

"We'd like to be able to have two sets of equipment," Johnson said. "One here and one in a van, to go to the Mullins Center or different events."

Certainly such advances will entice new members, but Splansky says it's really up to the students and how far they want to take it. Some people come down intending for television to be their career, and some just want to pursue a hobby. Either way, there will always be students at UVC willing to give advice and criticism.



"The amount of theory that goes into production is immense. Once you learn how to make TV you'll never watch it in the same way," Splansky said.

The key is to stick with it and not be discouraged, which is easy at UVC because it's a small and friendly atmosphere. Students are encouraged to develop ideas for their own shows or help out with others.

"If you work as much as you can as long as you can, we've had people work for CNN or NBC, people who've been Emmy-award winning journalists. It's up to each person," said Splansky.

Orientations for UVC-TV 19 are free and available up to the end of the semester, and are the only requirement to be a member. To use the equipment, you must take just four workshops, which start up next semester.

make or break the game for the Minutewomen.

"Believe it or not, free positions are not — for me, personally, anyway — as nerve-racking as people might think. There are a lot of different ways you can play the ball; it's an angle thing. If the defense does their job and holds them in their one position, then they have only one shot, one angle. It's tough when there's 20 seconds left and it's a tie score, or something like that. Then you've just got to stop the damn ball."

Finally, as UMass' All-American candidate in goal aptly sums up: "Not just anybody can be a goalie. You've got to be a little crazy. You've got to have a strong mind. You can't let yourself get down or you're done. It doesn't matter how good or fast you are to the ball. If you hang your head, it's over."

UMass football hoping for a repeat as Spring Game nears

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Correspondent

It feels good to be the best.

Just ask Todd Bankhead, Matt Dawson, Marcel Shipp, Kole Ayi, and the rest of the Massachusetts football team, who have been feeling great ever since they seized the 1998 Division I-AA National Championship title.

It's a dream come true and something that all of us have worked for our whole lives to be able to do," Dawson said. "It's something that everybody that plays football and goes to college wants to be able to say they did and not very many people can say that they did, and it makes me feel proud of myself."

And now that they've had a taste of the respect, recognition, and praise that accompanies victory, they're reluctant to relinquish it, religiously and ardently preparing to defend their title.

"This conditioning and our spring practice is really geared to beating New Hampshire. That's the most important game on our schedule," Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple said. "Our main goal is to win our opener which we haven't done, to win the conference, and to beat our rival UConn, who beat us twice last year, so we have a lot of motivation there."

Following their victory the team almost immediately began their physical conditioning regimen which consisted of running and weight training, and on April 2 began spring practice, which will require them to start training in gear for about a month.

"I'm watching a lot of tape of last years games trying to learn from mistakes and trying to get my mind focused on getting better," Bankhead said.

All of this preparation will lead up to their spring game on the first of May.

Some players like sophomore linebacker Ayi and sophomore tailback Shipp are still recovering from injuries.

"I'm limited in some of the things I can do" Ayi said.

"They said it's a tough injury, and it takes a while to recover from. But I'm trying to get it healed up, and get ready for next year."

Added Shipp: "I'm coming off a knee injury that I had towards the end of the season. It hasn't been bothering me lately, so hopefully it's all over."

But Whipple understands that in order to retain their title next season they must prepare mentally as well as physically.

"I was concerned when we came back in February, when we started second semester, that they might have what I call 'fat cat attitudes,' and be complacent in workouts, but that has not been the case," he said. "They've been very positive and they've been much more disciplined because they have a belief in our system and in one another. I think that we've been more precise in our conditioning, and in understanding what it takes to be a champion."

Farrah Alexander

Dawson agrees: "I think our confidence level was a lot higher last year than it was two years ago. It's tough to have a lot of confidence when your 2-9, but once we started winning I think it became habit. You expect to win, it gives you much more confidence."

Even so, Bankhead realizes that retaining their title will be an even greater challenge next season.

"I think teams that we're playing this next year will kind of see what we've done and, they'll know about us and won't be overlooking us in any way, so we've got to be that much better and we've got to work that much more hard to be ready for that challenge because it's going to be a lot tougher than it was last year," he said. "Last year before we started the season we kind of had the mindset that we were the underdog and teams were taking us lightly. That's not going to be the case this year. Teams are going to be gunning for us."

Said Ayi in agreement: "I think we're going to have to prepare a little better because other teams will prepare harder for us, and we're going to be the hunted — that's kind of actually a motivator for us."

While the team will have to make some adjustments to compensate for key players who are graduating, Whipple doesn't think it will necessarily be a disadvantage to this year's team.

"Their [the departing seniors'] leadership is certainly going to be missed. We've asked our seniors this year to look at that," he said. "We think we have players that can replace those guys. The best thing they did was that they set a standard for this program that every team will be matched up against, and I think that this current team has really accepted that challenge and has worked very hard to meet those standards."

Added Dawson: "Whoever's turn it is to step into that position has to pick up their game and try to play to those people's level which is tough, but that's the way every team has it."

The Minutemen may have numerous hurdles before them, but what they do have on their side is a very commanding and resolute coach who has shown that he can motivate, and deliver victories.

"He is like your father," Shipp said. "When we lose we know that the next week's practice is going to be hell, and so were winning every game and playing our hearts out. He just stays on us."

Bankhead also shared his teammate's beliefs: "Coach Whipple right from the start was talking about winning a championship, and really instilled a toughness in the players and a belief that we could be a good team. That's one of the greatest things he did when he came in."

So with a national championship to their credit and a solid nucleus returning this fall, it appears once again that the Minutemen will be one of the favorites to hold the title of best I-AA team in the land.

Williams seems to be lost in the Boston shuffle, but doesn't mind t's easy to forget about Jimy Williams. With the lamebrain antics of General Manager Dan Duquette and Chief Executive Officer John Harrington usurping the spotlight, it's no mystery why the mild-mannered manager has been overlooked during his tenure with the Red Sox.

But while Sox fans have been preoccupied with front office follies, Williams has established himself as the driving force behind the 1999 edition of this ball club.

Consider the stories that made headlines this past offseason — Mo Vaughn flew the coop, street vendors were banished and welcomed back again, the ethics of team physician Arthur Pappas were questioned (again), ticket prices skyrocketed, and Harrington's control of the Yawkey Trust was shrouded with controversy. How can Williams possibly compete with this endless parade of debacles for recognition?

The unfortunate answer is, he can't. Williams' post-game commentary lacks the drama and controversy that the media is accustomed to hearing. When Williams is asked about a particular player, he is more than likely to respond with some version of: "I like him. The kid's a player."

As a result, many Boston sportswriters have dismissed the low-key man from Arroyo Grande, Cal. as a hick, misinterpreting his succinct comments and ho-hum demeanor as unintelligence.

Mike Barnicle once wryly stated of Williams, "I wouldn't want him taking my college boards for me." But to judge Williams solely by his sound-bytes to the media is completely unjustified.

His stats speak for themselves. In his second season as manager in Boston, Williams led the Sox to the second best record in the American League last year (92-70). He ranked second in the vote for AL Manager of the Year by the Baseball Writers Association. But Williams' importance to the team goes far beyond his numbers.

The Red Sox need Williams — period. Williams is a baseball man, pure and simple. He chooses to distance himself from off-the-field controversies and devote his passions entirely to playing the game — and it's a good thing.

If Williams ever became entangled in front office shenanigans, the team no doubt would be overwhelmed with distractions and be incapable of contending. Without him, there would be no one to counterbalance the imbecility of the men upstairs.

Williams has procured the loyalty of his players — something that Duquette and Harrington could never hope to do. Everyone from Vaughn to John Valentin has attacked the front office for various reasons. The most recent outburst occurred when the customarily amiable Nomar Garciaparra expressed his disdain for the decision to send Lou Merloni to Pawtucket.

But when is the last time you heard a player berate Williams? Even Vaughn, whose clashes with the Duke have become infamous, has praised his former manager on more than one occasion.

Williams proved his allegiance to his players during a recent series versus the Cleveland Indians. When a brawl broke out after Rheal Cormier hit Indian Jim Thome, Williams was on the field in a flash, ready to fight for his team. It took the multi-million dollar arm of Pedro Martinez to restrain the loyal manager.

This incident exemplifies why the players respect Williams — they know that he trusts them, believes in them, and will defend them.

The players always know where they stand with Williams. A relationship based on mutual trust... gee, that's something lacking between the players and the front office. Remember when Vaughn had a sneaking suspicion that Duquette had hired a private investigator to spy on the Hit Dog? This may have been paranoia on Vaughn's part, but the fact remains that the players' trust of Duquette and Harrington is shaky at best.

Williams, on the other hand, is a sure thing — the players know there are no crafty ulterior motives when it comes to their trusty manager.

The Red Sox recently announced that the contract of Williams has been extended through the year 2000. He probably will never be the subject of sports radio call-in shows, but Williams is comfortable blending into the woodwork. Subdued by nature, the manager will continue to quietly — and effectively — get the job done.

Saratlic torn apart between homeland and UMass crew

By Chris Spring
Collegian Staff

In her role for the Massachusetts women's crew team, Tamara Saratlic occupies the stroke seat. She has commanded that seat for the varsity eight squad, the varsity four, and also the quad during her collegiate career.

It is a position of great importance in determining the outcome of a race, but for Saratlic it has taken on less significance these days. Although she remains devoted to the crew team, her thoughts are dominated by what is happening back home in Novi Sad, Yugoslavia.

Novi Sad is the second biggest city in Yugoslavia, with only the capital of Belgrade being more prominent. As NATO has intensified its air attacks, the number of bombs wounding Novi Sad has increased as well.

The war in Kosovo and Yugoslavia is all too real for Tamara, and especially her family and friends back home. Unlike the average UMass student, she doesn't get to enjoy the protective shell that most Americans live in.

How has all this affected Saratlic?

"I definitely think she's been preoccupied with everything going on and bombs falling so close to her family," Massachusetts women's crew coach Jim Dietz.

Due to the unfortunate circumstances, Saratlic has had trouble staying focused at times.

"I was doing pretty well before but when this started, I wouldn't go to classes because I was just watching the news and surfing the internet," she said. "Then, when I went to class I couldn't follow what they were talking about. I would look at the professor, hear one sentence and think, 'that is so unimportant.'"

This is Saratlic's third semester at UMass. She is a junior English and Italian major who is taking seven classes in addition to rowing for the team. She talks to her family and friends fairly often over the phone and also via e-mail. However, communications have hit a snag recently as NATO has taken out targets in Novi Sad including all three bridges into the city, last last weekend they bombed the last remaining bridge in the city over by the Danube River.

"I'm e-mailing them all the time, but now they can't get a connection. Every time they have bombed a bridge, I have lost the connection," she said. "I would like to be over with my family, but they want me to be here."

"My friends from home would send me e-mail everyday saying 'please, just fight for your own life, there is nothing you can do for us here,'" added Saratlic. "Don't even dream about coming back here into the war when you can be there in the States."

Saratlic reaffirms that Slobodan Milosevic is a horrible dictator. Yugoslavia has been at war ever since he came into power by trying to enact his policy of "ethnic cleansing." She lends no support to the air war being staged by NATO.

"I do not support NATO's bombings. He (Milosevic) is the one that is guilty and not all these people that are dying. It would be perfect if they just bombed his residence, but they bombed the bridges, the factories, and the oil refineries," Saratlic said. "The refinery is just around the corner from where I lived."

Other landmarks from Saratlic's past are also gone.

"They just knocked down the bridge that was next to my rowing club. I would pass it four times a day when I was practicing so it was like my bridge," she said. "There were a lot of memories there."

From the day she started rowing, Saratlic's dream was to one day row for Yugoslavia in the Olympic Games. That dream is all but lost for now, though, with the unrest and division in what was formerly a united Yugoslavia.

"It's frowing for Yugoslavia] something I've been working for since I started rowing. My father was my coach, and that was his wish also," she said. "We don't even have a national team now."

Dietz also sympathizes with the wish of one of the stars of his team.

"It's tough when you want to compete on such a high level and politics interfere," he said. "This is coming from an athlete who was denied a chance to compete in the 1980 Olympics because the U.S. boycotted them."

For now, Saratlic's concern isn't what might have been, but rather what looms ahead in this fragile situation. Her homeland has historically been one of the most tumultuous corners of the globe, and things have only gotten worse since the campaign began.

The number of fleeing refugees has exploded, and they bring with them horrific stories of their people being slaughtered. The growing commitment of the United States military coupled with the resilience of the Serbs seems to point toward a drawn-out conflict.

"I think people are not aware of how big this can be. It really can become the Third World War," Saratlic said. "World War I started in the Balkans, and the second world war, where was it? It was right there."

For now she will pray, along with the rest of us, that NATO never resorts to the deployment of ground troops.

"That is the one thing I am praying for — that they don't send in ground troops. If they send in ground troops, there will be complete mobilization in Yugoslavia," Saratlic said. "They are mobilizing right now, but this would be complete. All men ages 18 to 65 must go. I have a brother there who's 21. He rows too and he is my best friend, so that is my worst nightmare."

The reasons for Saratlic's fears are her understanding of her own people and also the stakes that NATO is playing for.

"The thing is, Serbian people and Yugoslavian people are stubborn. Everyone is attacking them. They want to save their territory, which is normal," she said. "Animals are the same. If you attack, she's going to defend herself. Also, Kosovo is a huge historical place for Yugoslavia."

It is a unique perspective for Tamara Saratlic, finding herself in America while her beleaguered homeland is attacked by this very country. She has a grasp on what is truly important and is thankful for her personal situation.

"I would like to thank coach Dietz for the opportunity to row and go to school here," she said.

Although it is extremely difficult to remain optimistic under these circumstances, Tamara is still hopeful that things will turn out for the better.

"My parents keep telling me, 'this will be over soon, and you can come back.' I have a plane ticket for the first of June — after the NCAA's," she said.

If things haven't progressed positively by then she will remain here for the summer. When she does return to Novi Sad, Saratlic knows she will be a changed person, and that the people close to her will have changed significantly as well.

Then it will be time to rebuild the life she once knew.

"We can build new bridges, we can build new buildings, and we can build new factories, but we will never be able to bring back all the lives that are gone," Saratlic said.

where I was," Hedgecock said.

When it came time for Hedgecock to chose what college to attend, the final decision was between UMass and the University of North Carolina–Wilmington.

"When I came on my recruit, I loved the team. They were very friendly and didn't exclude me from anything. That brought me in like they knew me forever," she said.

Another big reason that enticed her to attend the university was the diversity that it brought to the table.

"I come from a really small town and there are so many different kinds of people here," she said. "It scared me at first. I came here not knowing anyone."

Before she came to UMass, Hedgecock set high goals. Those goals have yet to be obtained, but she remains optimistic.

"If I stay this way I think I will [reach the goals]," she said. "My goals now are to make it through a season. I take it meet by meet. When I came, my goals were to do a lot better than I did [in high school]. Now I just want to do better than I did last time — it's the only way I can go about it or else I'd be beating up on myself all the time."

At the Columbia Invitational Hedgecock showed that she can still compete at a high level even with the adversity she has dealt with. "It's the best I've seen her run since she came here," said Massachusetts women's track coach Julie LaFreniere of Hedgecock's performance that day.

Hedgecock placed first in the second heat of the 100 meters and second in heat two of the 200 meters. She showed great modesty for her accomplishments, however.

"My family was there, it was a big deal," she said. "[And] the weather was really nice. I run a lot better in the sun."

For all the adversity that Hedgecock has endured since arriving in Amherst, she maintains a positive attitude. She doesn't dwell on the injuries or blame anything. Hedgecock is an athlete that does what she has to just to at a level to compete. The positive outlook that she has is a standard that others should imitate.

UM solid at Penn Relays

By Melissa Sherman
Collegian Staff

The smell of victory is in the air, and a select few from the Massachusetts men's track and field team are responsible for it. This past weekend select Minutemen attended the prestigious Penn Relays in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania where they captured numerous first place finishes.

Junior Vic Morency captured the win for the fifth time this season. His presence on the field has helped put this team over the top. Not only dominating on the field, taking the win in the javelin throw at the relays for the second consecutive season with a throw of 225-feet-2-inches, topping last year's throw of 215-feet-11-inches, and setting a new school record, beating the old mark of 217-feet-10-inches, and a NCAA Provisional Qualifying mark. He also captured a ninth place ranking in the discus with a distance of 163-feet-6-inches.

Also on the field, Minuteman BJ Cardoza threw the hammer landing him ninth place in the event with a mark of 191-feet-6-inches.

The relay teams were at it again, too. The 4x200-meter relay team, with seniors Tom Toye and Neil Concepcion, running with sophomore Hugh Reid and freshman Adrian Zullo, was among the top 24 teams in the preliminary heats on Friday. They continued their streak on Saturday, finishing third with a time of 1:27.12 in the 16A-A race. Toye and Concepcion later teamed up with sophomore Marc Sylvander and freshman Mike Howell to place sixth in the 4x400-meter relay.

Sophomore standout Brendan Sullivan ran the 3,000-meter steeplechase, finishing 11th overall, with a time of 9:25.34, making him a New England Qualifier.

After placing second in last year's Atlantic 10 Championships the Minutemen will return to action this weekend at Virginia Tech, hoping to surpass those efforts, which were an astounding accomplishment in a sport that focuses more on the individual score than the team score. UMass coach Ken O'Brien has said that this is a very balanced team with prominent athletes scoring in all events — the running, the relays and on the field. There are no gaps, no stones left unturned, everywhere you look there is a standout.

That is precisely what you can expect from the Minutemen they warm up early Saturday morning in preparation for competition against the other Atlantic 10 teams: Virginia Tech, Rhode Island, St. Joe's, Dayton, Temple, Duquesne, La Salle and Fordham.

Morency will continue to be an immediate point scorer and thrive on the field with his javelin throw and aspire to top last year's fourth place finish. He will be joined by sophomores Jesse Austin and Chad Schwarz. They will venture to this weekend's meet in hopes of surpassing their fifth and sixth place finishes at last years A-10's.

Senior Albie Vasquez, another top contributor, scored second in last years championships in the pole vault, and set the UMass record in this arena. Freshman Wesley Shaw will assist Vasquez on the field.

Their secret weapon? The relay teams. Toye and Concepcion will again team up with Reid and Zullo for the 4x200-meter relay where they will continue their assault on the competition and the record books.

Concepcion a member of the 4x400-meter relay team that finished third at last years A-10's will team up with Toye, Sylvander and freshman Mike Howell in search for a win.

Senior Ben Baraldi will plunge into this weekend's events competing in the 110-meter hurdles. He will look to overcome last years fourth place finish where he managed to set the third-best time in school history.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You and a friend or lover of one may seem to be on different wavelengths during a portion of the day. Take time to be honest and specific.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You are too serious about your own personal endeavors at this time. Adopt a more relaxed attitude and demeanor and circumstances will improve.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You'll be looking for shortcuts today, but in the end, you'll have to check your work carefully, so you might as well be thorough from the beginning. Don't be lazy!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Your optimistic outlook will benefit others, as well as yourself today. As long as you put your ideas into motion and turn words into action, the sky's the limit!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — This is a good day for you to take charge and make changes you know are necessary for yourself and others. Your actions affect many at this time.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You have the power to minimize your fears today, and to banish any further doubt you may have about a current project for good.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may be easy to second-guess today, but it is unlikely that anyone will try to take advantage of you outright. However, play it safe!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may be feeling "stuck" at this time, but the only person holding you back is you! You may have to dispense with old ways of thinking.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may find yourself immersed in a situation you can neither comprehend, nor control. Your fate is in someone else's hands at this time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You'll be in the position to compare the desirable from the undesirable in more than one area today. There's no need to keep opinions to yourself.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You'll feel more vigorous, enthusiastic, and energetic in may ways today, mostly as the result of a chance encounter which opens your eyes.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Race to finish ahead of others today and you may find that you were having more fun taking part! Cooperation is better than competition.

Sweeps lead the way as NHL's 2nd season starts

The National Hockey League's second season has started. Yes, it's true. This is the most wonderful time of the year for hockey fans.

The biggest news coming out of the NHL are three easy sweeps that have already been completed in the conference quarterfinal tournament.

It comes as no surprise that the Dallas Stars have quickly eliminated the Edmonton Oilers. The Oilers put up a nice effort in the final game as they battled for three overtimes, before Joe Nieuwendyk scored the game-winner off his leg to end the Oilers season, but Oilers fans need to remember that this team was lucky to be in the playoffs. After all, they went out and picked up the Islanders trash, in the form of goalie Tommy Salo, who is the definition of a sieve.

Paul Teves on the NHL

The Oilers also were hurt by the loss of Roman Hamrlik (sprained knee) and Doug Weight, who was kicked in the face by teammate Ryan Smyth's skate, when he was up- ended in a collision.

The more stunning news has to be the sweep of the Anaheim Mighty Ducks, who were playing pretty good hockey heading into the playoffs, but fell in four straight to the Red Wings. Tomas Holmstrom picks it up come playoff time. He scored again in the fourth game, to make it three consecutive games.

The Ducks have been without Paul Kariya, and have also been missing the play of Stu Grimson, that is until they were ousted the other night. The suspension to Grimson hurt the Ducks' chances, but remember, this team wasn't very deep to begin with.

The Buffalo Sabres are riding the coattails of the dominator again, as they swept the No. 2-seeded Senators. The concerns coming out of Ottawa, besides the fact that they couldn't win a game, was the terrible play of Alexei Yashin, who failed to be the impact player when one would have expected him to be.

The most interesting series in terms of flip flops has to be the series involving the Phoenix Coyotes and the St. Louis Blues. The Blues came into the playoffs riding high and playing super hockey, but have since fallen and Grant Fuhr isn't as hot as he was in 1987, while the Coyotes were the best team in the playoffs that everybody wanted to play.

The Coyotes have opened up a three to one lead in the series and looked to close it out late last night. What makes the accomplishment all the more impressive is that Jeremy Roenick isn't playing.

The Toronto Maple Leafs, after dropping the first game of the series, have since refocused themselves and have moved back in front of the Philadelphia Flyers to gain a two- games-to-one advantage over the Flyers. Philly is definitely missing their captain right now, as Eric Lindros continues to sit out with a punctured lung.

The Bruins are hurting as well. They are playing the worst team that made the playoffs with the exception of the Edmonton Oilers, in the form of the Carolina Hurricanes. The 'Canes somehow have found a way to win two games in a row, but the more physical and better coached B's should be able to bring the series back under their control assuming that Byron "the Bum" Dafoe, doesn't give up anymore soft game-winning-goals.

Dafoe has struggled in the playoffs like I said he would. Why? It's simple, because he is not a playoff goalie, and if he wins the Vezina Trophy I will lose all respect for the NHL and that award.

In the series that has the most potential of going seven games, the Penguins have won two games without the services of Jaromir Jagr, which makes what they have done to Martin Brodeur all the more impressive. Brodeur has put forth a couple of solid efforts in earning two wins for the Devils. Expect New Jersey to finish off the Penguins in the next two unless Jagr comes back.

The San Jose Sharks and the Colorado Avalanche have been playing in a series that started late due to the tragic shooting that occured in Columbine High School, just south of Denver.

The Avs', as expected, are up two games to none and will continue to dominate the series. There will be no early exit for the 'Lanche this season. The Avs' should be expected to be in the finals of the conference.

If the core of the team, including, Joe Sakic, Petr Forsberg, Theo Fleury and Patrick Roy, continue to play quality hockey in Colorado, they will continue to win. The important thing is they won both games on the road now the 'Lanche go home for three.

• In news not related to the playoffs. The NHL is threathening to fold the Pittsburgh organization due to bankruptcy, while at the same time, former premier goal scorer Mario Lemieux is now trying to make a big save to keep the Pens in Pittsburgh.

UMass gets ready to face Eagles in Beanpot Final

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

After missing out on the finals of last year's Beanpot Tournament because of rain, the Massachusetts baseball team will finally get a chance to defend its crown this afternoon at 2 p.m. when it faces Boston College at Fenway Park.

The Minutemen (22-12, 10-2 in the Atlantic 10) are coming of a 13-12 come-from-behind victory over Harvard on Tuesday afternoon. UMass trailed 10-4 in the fourth inning before storming back to take an 11-10 lead in the top of the seventh inning.

Thanks to a two-run longball by Nick Corneault in the top of the ninth, the Minutemen were up 13-10 heading into the Crimson's final at-bat. Harvard struck for two quick runs with one out to cut the UMass lead to only a run at 13-12, but Nick Skirkanich forced Eric Binkowski to bounce into a double play to end the game and put the Maroon and White in the finals.

"Our attitude at UMass is that you are never out of the game," said Corneault, who finished 4-for-4 with five RBI on the day. "We always feel confident that we are going to come back because we have a lot of weapons."

The Minutemen had pitching woes all afternoon against the Crimson and used several of their weekday pitchers in the process. With Bill Cooke, Travis Veracka and David Loonie all stationed in their customary weekend spots in the rotation, Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone will likely hand the ball over to freshman Brian Hourigan this afternoon.

"We're probably going to go with Brian Hourigan, but we'll see what happens," he said following Tuesday's game. "We don't use our weekend guys on the weekday. Craig Szado had an injury today, but maybe he can go on Thursday."

While the pitching scenario for the Minutemen is still up in the air, one element of UMass' game that has come to the ballpark almost every day is its high-octane offensive attack.

Senior right fielder Aaron Braunstein smacked his team- leading 10th home run of the season over the Green Monster on Tuesday, and is also the team leader in RBI with 43.

Corneault has also been on a hot streak as of late, while Bryan Mazzaferro, Brian Samela, Shaun Skeffington, Scott Anderson and Chris Morgan are all over .300. Freshman outfielder Mike Kulak is one of the team's leading hitters with a .360 mark, but he suffered a hamstring injury last weekend against Fordham and missed Tuesday's semfinal game. His status for today's championship game was unavailable at press time.

Boston College (18-18, 5-12 in the Big East) won the first semifinal matchup on Tuesday with a 9-7 win over Northeastern. The Eagles actually trailed 2-1 in the bottom of the seventh before erupting for eight runs in the frame to take control of the game.

Offensively, the boys from Chestnut Hill are led by Sean McGowan, who is batting .469 with 20 home runs and 59 RBI. Other top hitters include Joe Kealty (.396, 28 RBI), Jeff Waldron (.376, six homers) and Jarrett Mendoza (.353 average). Eric Olson has also added eight home runs for the Eagles.

Nardi like a brick wall for UMass lax

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

At the position of goalie in any sport that requires one, perhaps the most important quality is a short memory, especially in lacrosse, where the scores are often high enough so that a net-minder who over-thinks the past is all but useless.

If the former is true, then it is a wonder how Massachusetts women's lacrosse goalie Jen Nardi ever remembers her name.

"I've seen other goalies play and I've watched their reactions after they've let in a goal. It helps me to realize how I should react, because you can't get down on yourself — especially at goalie," Nardi said. "If you hang your head, it just shows the other team that they've got you."

Added Massachusetts women's lacrosse coach Francesca McClellan: "Playing goaltender is definitely all about recovery. In our sport, goals are going to go into the cage. It's a high-scoring game... You're going to have a ball go by you, and, can you shake it off and deal with the next one? Goalies have to be able to play one ball at a time."

Maybe to make the whole issue of remembering her name simple, the sophomore from Valley Cottage, N.Y., could just equate herself to a common object that she might resemble — like, say, a brick wall.

At least that's what the suggestion might be from the countless opposing attackers that have been denied all-but- certain scores by Nardi.

The stifling Minutewoman goalie has frustrated the opposition with an Atlantic 10-leading .714 save percentage. Over the course of her 4-1 conference mark, Nardi has recorded an astoundingly low 4.94 goals against average, another A-10 best in a laundry list of statistical proofs of her regional superiority.

The conference recognized this dominance by naming the sophomore Atlantic 10 Player of the Week after her role in this past weekend's defeats of Virginia Tech and Duquesne, two victories that solidified UMass' seeding of second in the coming A-10 tournament in Philadelphia.

Her current tenacity between the pipes, McClellan notes, really came to a head against school-rival Connecticut, and continues to this day.

"I think her UConn game was her break-through game as far as her consistency," McClellan said. "Since that game, she's shown solid, consistent play, which is something we'd been looking for."

Comparing Maroon No. 2 to only the Northeastern portion of the country doesn't tell the whole story, though. After assuming the position of the starting goaltender for the first time this season on March 24, Nardi has quickly climbed to the top of the national charts as well. While she can't officially be counted among the country's leaders because of the fact that she's only played 57 percent of Massachusetts' minutes, her save percentage and GAA would place her at the numbers one and eight spots in America, respectively.

If Nardi plays Saturday's first round A-10 tournament game against Virginia Tech in its entirety, she'll be at the 60 percent of team minutes necessary to qualify her for national ranking.

Regardless of what happens this weekend, the goalie is still the backbone of the ninth best scoring defense in the country, allowing only 7.07 goals a game.

"She's a very aggressive goalie," two-time Northeast Regional All-American defender and teammate Lynne Young said. "She's very heads-up and she knows what's going on all around the field. She's got a good concept of the game... You just have so much trust in her that if you're doing your job on defense, there's no way the ball's going in the net."

Especially when the game's on the line. In a battle for post-season positioning, UMass clung to a narrow lead in the waning moments of what would turn out to be an 8-7 victory against Virginia Tech — thanks in large part to the play of Nardi.

In that game, and in many others, the sophomore has been faced with opposing free position shots that could

UMass sotball squad to play host to RU today

By Matt Frascella

Home sweet home.

Every time that the Massachusetts softball team has taken to Ruth J. Totman Field this season it has come away with a victory this season, leading them to a perfect 10-0 home record so far.

That mark will be put on the line today when the Minutewomen play host to Rutgers University at 2 p.m. on the field that has never disappointed them this season.

Currently riding a 14-game win streak, No. 17 UMass (34-8) hopes to rebound from a shaky showing in Rhode Island last weekend that almost put an end to that impressive streak. It took a late inning rally to notch consecutive win number 14.

Cherra Wheeler

"Everything that could go wrong for us [at URI] did," UMass softball coach Elsine Sortino said. "We hit balls right at them. We ripped balls that deadened in the wind. Of the four runs that they got none of them came on balls that were hit hard."

Last Saturday the Minutewomen were thrown into a literally hostile environment. The vicious wind played a major factor in the decision, but UMass crawled back in the second game to escape with two more wins.

The five days of rest since then have aided the team. Sortino felt that her team had begun to be worn down by a rigorous schedule and that some time between games has allowed the Massachusetts squad to rest and refocus.

That focus has been directed at the next opponent, Rutgers. Rutgers comes to Amherst sporting a 22-22 record, yet should challenge the Minutewomen.

"We arrange our schedule for a reason," Sortino said. "We play tough non-conference games along with our toughest conference opponent sandwiched in the middle."

The aim of this is to gear UMass for the postseason. This final homestand will allow the team to face their last challenges of the regular season at Totman Field instead of in hostile territory. With the Atlantic 10 division leading Virginia Tech squad coming on Sunday for Senior Day, this stretch will be crucial for the Minutewomen and their seeding in the A-10 tournament next weekend.

Sortino is not concerned her team will look past the 500 ballers from Rutgers.

"No, no, no, no, no, this team does not look past anybody," Sortino said. "We haven't even talked about Virginia Tech."

In order to beat Rutgers UMass will have to silence the bats from the Big East power. Rutgers boasts seven batters who hit above .300 while their staff ace has compiled a 1.50 earned run average en route to 19 wins.

Leading the Minutewomen in their final three doubleheaders of the regular season will be the seniors. Senior pitcher Danielle Henderson has received national recognition for her achievements. Currently she ranks second in the nation in ERA while leading the nation in strikeouts per seven innings.

The Minutewomen have never lost this season at Totman and that is a statistic that they do not want to change.

Hedgecock rebounding nicely from knee surgery

By Bryan Smith

Reoccurring injuries and rehabilitation are the words that best describe the career of Jamie Hedgecock since she came to the University of Massachusetts. Hedgecock is a junior sociology major on the UMass women's track team who retains an extra year of eligibility due to the obstacles that she has had to endure in the last three years.

"I've had some," said Hedgecock with a smile when asked about her injuries.

The native of Warwick, NY, redshirted her freshman season, then had cortizone shots in her knee during her first season. The cortizone treatments were just the beginning, as knee surgery followed.

Hedgecock down-played the surgery, however.

"It's not that big of a surgery," she said.

Hedgecock was hampered by stress fractures that kept her out of half of the indoor season, but now she is finally healthy and striving to return to the form that brought her to Amherst.

Hedgecock has had to work exceptionally hard just to be in competing shape.

"The trainer is my best friend," she said. "He helps me through everything. He puts me on individual programs in the weight room."

The road to a return started in the pool, then to the exercise bike, and finally on to the track once a week.

"It was so hard to get back on the track. I'm still off in time from

Graduation speaker announced

Chancellor of NYC schools to receive honorary degree

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Rudolph Crew will be delivering the main address to approximately 4,000 graduating seniors at the 129th University of Massachusetts Commencement ceremony on Sunday, May 23.

Crew is a UMass alumnus and the chancellor of the Board of Education for the City of New York. Massachusetts Lt. Governor Jane Swift will also attend the ceremony to deliver the greetings to the Commonwealth.

Crew is nationally recognized for his work in implementing urban education reforms and has been chancellor of New York City public schools since 1995. Prior to his current position he was superintendent of school systems in California and Washington.

He is a leading proponent of performance-driven public education, which focuses on increasing academic development of students through an emphasis on literacy, school-based responsibility, and parental involvement.

Crew and several others will be receiving honorary degrees during the Undergraduate Commencement. The most recognizable of all the honorary degree recipients is jazz musician and recording artist Wynton Marsalis.

Other than Crew and Marsalis, honorary degrees will be given to three other people: John P. Flavin, a businessman and University alumnus who is the national chairman of Campaign UMass; Shirley Ann Jackson, chairman of the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission who will become president of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in July; and Diana Chapman Walsh, president of Wellesley College.

Three additional honorary degrees will be given during the graduate commencement ceremonies held on Saturday, May 15 at 10:30 am.

Mary Maples Dunn, director of the Arthur and Elizabeth Schlesinger Library at Radcliffe college; Vladimir Haensel, a professor emeritus of chemical engineering and winner of the 1997 Charles Stark Draper Prize; and Ervin H. Zube, professor emeritus and former head of the University's department of landscape architecture and regional planning; will be receiving honorary degrees during graduate commencement.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Chancellor of New York City public schools and UMass alum Rudolph Crew is scheduled as the feature speaker at commencement on May 23, 1999.

Both ceremonies will take place in the Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Also on May 22, approximately 100 students will receive associate of science degrees from the Stockbridge School of Agriculture at 2 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. The keynote speaker is Paul F. Miller, a 1970 Stockbridge alumnus and director of golf course operations at the Nashawtuc Country Club in Concord.

Other events taking place on May 22 include: Phi Beta Kappa Installation in the Campus Center auditorium at 2:30 p.m.; School of Nursing Pinning Ceremony in the Fine Arts Center at 3 p.m.; and ROTC Joint Commissioning Ceremony in Bowker Auditorium at 5 p.m.

"I have no idea who the speaker is or what topic he's talking about. I don't remember getting any material about who we wanted to have," said graduating senior Julie Christopher, a consumer studies major.

Clothesline reminder of abuse

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

During the Vietnam War years, approximately 58,000 American soldiers were killed. So were 51,000 women in the United States — by men who supposedly loved them.

That startling statistic shocked a group of Cape Cod women into action. In 1990, the Clothesline Project was formed to break the silence about violence and unite men and women across the country "in a demonstration of solidarity against physical, verbal, sexual, psychological and social abuse," a Project facts sheet states.

Much like the Vietnam Wall and AIDS quilt project, the Clothesline project also aims to make a powerful visual statement, putting a human face on the statistics of violence against women.

"The Clothesline itself symbolizes a lifeline which joins women together to feel empowered and supported by one another," states National Clothesline Project literature. "The shirts are hung side by side on the Clothesline, as though the survivors were standing there themselves, shoulder to shoulder."

An estimated 35,000 shirts have been displayed nationally and internationally since the Project began nine years ago. And today, more than 140 shirts dedicated by Five-College men and women will join the growing tally.

The Five-College Clothesline will be on display today from 10 a.m. – 1 p.m. on the lawn alongside the Student Union. Organized entirely by Five-College students, the project is "a tool to raise awareness," according to University of Massachusetts student Tara Kavanaugh, who organized today's display as part of her master's thesis.

"It [violence against women] is a very silent issue," she said. "Our goals really are to try to raise awareness so we can begin to combat the problem. For me, it was very powerful to hear that more than 100 survivors in the community have stepped forward."

"It's hard to look at 140 T-shirts and not be [affected] by it," she continued. "People are confronted with it. [But] they have to realize it's a problem. It does happen and we need to try to stop it... so we don't have more shirts added to the line everyday."

Town Meeting members debate funding for elementary schools, elderly programs

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — From the elderly to the elementary, issues surrounding several generations of Amherst residents were addressed during last night's Town Meeting.

As part of the methodical process of approving the operating budget, programs for the elderly and the town's elementary schools sparked debate.

The question of who should pay the extra $5,000 to increase the hours a nurse practitioner is available at the senior center polarized the Amherst Regional Middle School auditorium last night.

The budget originally allowed for the nurse to be at the senior center once a week as she has been in the past. This would mean that funding for more hours for the nurse would have to come from the $60,000 senior trust fund. Members from the Council on Aging, who oversee programs for the elderly, felt the town should pick up the tab, and an amendment was made to do so.

"I think the health of citizens should be a top priority," said Meeting member Mary Wentworth, who called the Select Board and Finance Committee's opposition to paying the $5,000 "Penny pinching of the worst kind."

But Select Board member Hill Boss explained the reasoning behind opposing having the town pay the $5,000.

"This will not be discontinued if you don't approve the extra $5,000," Boss said to the Meeting, telling them that the senior trust fund can afford to pay the $5,000 this year so the Select Board has time to look for other ways to pay for it next year.

Meeting member Isaac BenEzra said he won't "lose any sleep" when he has to think of a place in the budget to cut $5,000 so it remains balanced, citing the $300,000 for the parking garage. "We've got to figure out our priorities."

Several Select Board members pointed out that in a year when money is tight, and the balanced budget was hard to come by, the Board chose not to fund programs that would survive without their help.

The amendment to have the town pay for the $5,000 was passed 88 to 75. Despite voting unanimously previously for the budget that did not include the town paying the $5,000, one member of the Select Board and one member of the Finance Committee, voted for it.

The $13 million elementary school budget, which accounts for a large chunk of the operating budget, had been a hot topic in earlier months as the School Committee battled to rein in original budget that exceeded a recommended 5 percent growth cap.

"We stopped short of doing anything we thought would be drastic," said School Superintendent Gus Sayer.

Chairperson of the Amherst School Committee Myra Ross addressed questions about the elementary school from the Town Meeting.

Some Meeting members wanted to know why the scores of recent standardized testing of elementary school children showed Amherst lagging behind neighboring towns in some grade levels.

"Writing is where our kids fell down," Ross said.

She said she was as surprised as Amherst parents that towns some might consider "podunk" like Hatfield were "almost as good as ours in some grades."

"I don't know entirely why they do [better]... they have a more traditional curriculum," she said, but added that when comparing high school scores Amherst is "substantially higher" than its neighboring towns.

Sayer also addressed questions about bilingual education.

"We do have a bilingual education program. We have a special translator... that translates to them during a regular classes," Sayer said.

The elementary school budget was passed.

Bulgarian home hit during latest NATO attacks

By George Jahn

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Russia pushed a peace plan for Yugoslavia yesterday as a chagrined NATO sought to explain how another of its missiles went astray, damaging a house near the capital of Western ally Bulgaria.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson arrived in Belgrade on a mission to win freedom for three U.S. POWs held by Yugoslavia. He is expected to meet Yugoslav Foreign Minister Zivadin Jovanovic and the head of the Serbian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Pavle, today.

NATO, meanwhile, continued its air assault on Yugoslavia, targeting communication and transportation links. Yugoslavia's official Tanjug news agency said five missiles struck before dawn today near the airport in Pristina, Kosovo's capital.

Heavy explosions and intense anti-aircraft fire were reported yesterday afternoon near an oil refinery northwest of Belgrade. Serbian television went off the air yesterday evening moments after a strong explosion. The private Beta news agency said the main telecommunications tower at Mount Avala south of Belgrade was destroyed in the late night attack.

As a result, private TV stations in Belgrade were unable to retransmit

Scott talks to GOP society

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott has been under fire for months regarding the University's recent revisions to its admissions policy. Several rallies have been held by students critical of the new policy, insisting that the University make race a larger factor in admissions.

At last night's meeting of the UMass Republican Club, however, Scott was forced to defend the changes to an entirely different group of students — those who want the University to eliminate the use of race in admissions entirely.

Affirmative action was just one of many topics discussed at the meeting, where Scott listened to Republican Club members' complaints about what they perceive as a liberal bias at UMass.

"I believe that being a conservative on this campus is like being a communist during the McCarthy regime," said graduate student Ed Cutting.

While issues raised by students ranged from "liberal propaganda" in textbooks to a lack of conservative speakers on campus, the University's policies regarding diversity was the topic discussed at the greatest length.

When asked why the University continues to use race as a factor in

Bat discovered in CC

Yesterday at approximately 4:10 p.m., a bat was reported flying around the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Concourse.

The flying mammal was sighted by senior journalism major Alex Iglesias who says he heard a girl scream, turned around, saw the bat and started chasing it.

"I was on my way to another class and this seemed a lot more enjoyable to do, instead of sitting in another class," he said.

Iglesias said a security guard told him the bat entered through an opening in the roof of the Campus Center and flew around the concourse for about 30 minutes before entering the University Store.

Iglesias and Campus Center Security entered the store and cornered the bat in a storage room. Approximately 10 minutes passed before the bat left the storage room and flew into a recycling bin held by a University Store employee.

Senior political science major Noel Taylor witnessed the event and says he saw store customers running around screaming.

"People were either just freaked out, concerned about the bat, or yelling, 'please don't let it get me!'" Taylor said.

Haneef Sahabdeen, from Environmental Health and Safety, says this kind of problem is not serious unless the bat is feeling threatened.

"Usually animals flying in and out of buildings is not a problem," Sahabdeen said. "We don't recommend people confronting the animals or handling them because they're known to carry the rabies virus."

Sahabdeen says it is not rare for bats to fly into residential halls and encourages people to call Housing Services at 545-0812 or Environmental Health and Safety at 545-2682 if a situation arises.

New 'dolphin-safe' labels stir controversy

By H. Josef Hebert
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Federal officials said yesterday a new standard for the decade-long "dolphin safe" label on cans of tuna will help spur international efforts to protect dolphins. Critics insisted more dolphins will be killed.

The Commerce Department issued a new standard yesterday that allows the use of the "dolphin safe" label on tuna caught with huge encircling nets. Historically these nets also have ensnared many dolphins.

Supporters of the change will help international efforts to protect dolphin and other marine life, but critics said the new standard will lead to more dolphins being killed as they get caught in tuna nets.

The Commerce Department, however, said that it found insufficient evidence to conclude that the tuna nets cause a "significant adverse impact" on dolphin that often swim with tuna in the eastern Pacific Ocean.

A 1997 law lifted the embargo on tuna caught by encircling nets and it directed the Commerce Department to redefine the dolphin-safe label by the spring of this year.

Terry Garcia, assistant commerce secretary for oceans and atmosphere, disputed claims that the change will lead to more dolphin deaths. He said that the law requires observers on tuna boats using encircling nets and that they must certify no dolphin was killed of severely injured for that patch of tuna to carry the dolphin-safe label.

"Tuna labeled dolphin-safe will continue to be tuna that is caught without dolphin mortality or serious injury," Garcia said in an interview. "This method of encirclement on the whole is better for the marine environment because it reduces bycatch of other species."

Fewer than 2,000 dolphins were reported killed because of tuna fishing last year, compared with 133,000 in 1986.

But environmentalists and marine biologists were divided over whether the change in the label will benefit or harm efforts to protect dolphins.

"This will cheapen the label. It will confuse consumers," said John Fitzgerald, who as an environmental lobbyist helped write the legislation in 1990 that led to the dolphin– safe labeling. David Phillips, director of Earth Island Institute's marine mammal project near San Francisco, called the new standard a "consumer fraud and a death warrant for thousands of dolphin."

admissions decisions, Scott responded: "Because it's allowed by the Supreme Court.

"There's such a shortage of students of color going on to higher education that we need some sort of intervention," he continued. "We need to make [these interventions] to overcome the cumulative effects that people of color have had, and continue to have."

Club President Mike Rosette pointed out that groups like Jews and homosexuals have also been discriminated against, and asked, "Why aren't we recruiting them?"

"I think the facts will show that the difference in the number of Jewish students that are here, relative to the number in the population, there is not such a disparity as in African-Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans," Scott replied.

He also claimed that it would be impossible to recruit gay and lesbian students, because of the difficulty of defining human sexuality.

"You can't just say, 'This person is totally gay,' or, 'This person is totally heterosexual," said the Chancellor. "We all have elements of heterosexuality and homosexuality. There's a whole spectrum."

Many of the students were also unhappy with diversity–based Special Interest Residence Programs (SIRPS), which cater to specific cultures and ethnicities. They claimed that the halls are exclusionary, and promote negative race relations on campus.

"The civil rights movement was fought to end segregation, and now we're stimulating it," said former Republican Club President Paul Ferro.

Scott responded by relating an incident regarding a previously–existing womens' lounge on campus.

"I was asked by male students, 'When are we going to have a men's lounge?' and I said, 'That's the rest of campus,'" said the Chancellor.

Scott stated that the programs are helpful to minority students who "feel prejudice on a campus that is predominantly white.

"Studies show that until a group makes up 30 percent of the whole group, they will not feel a significant presence," he added. "If you walk into a classroom at random, it doesn't look very colorful."

Throughout the meeting, Republican Club members insisted that discrimination against conservatives is rampant within the University's faculty. They claimed that students who espouse liberal viewpoints are given better grades by professors, and that the University maintains a double–standard in its treatment of student demonstrators.

They pointed to an "Impeach Clinton" rally held by the club last December. Mike Marin, a former vice president of the organization, claimed that a student who disagreed with him attempted to rip a microphone from his hand, and upon failing, simply unplugged the microphone.

"If we had done something like that at Queerfest today, we would have been arrested and thrown off campus for committing a hate crime," said Cutting.

They also complained that many professors are intolerant of conservative views, in some cases mocking students who disagree with them.

Senior political science major Amy Pellegrino related an incident in which, she claimed, a teaching assistant (TA) in a womens' studies course asked students to announce their views on abortion. When one student asserted that she favored criminalizing abortion, the TA asked her, "How can you, as a college-age woman, possibly be pro-life?"

Scott assured the students that the incidents, as they were described, "seemed inappropriate," but that he would be unable to deal with specific complaints unless they were first filed with the proper authorities.

"There's a procedure for investigation, if you feel you've been discriminated against," he said. "If you don't get satisfaction [from the investigation], I will step in."

DC school gun scare

LITTLETON, Colo. (AP) — Investigators are interviewing a man who may have supplied the semiautomatic pistol used by the Columbine High School gunmen, but authorities said yesterday no arrests are imminent.

Although Jefferson County District Attorney David Thomas said early in the day that the gun seller would be arrested "in a day or two" after negotiating the terms of his surrender, other investigators later backed away from that statement.

Crime laboratory technicians are conducting ballistics tests to determine which guns fired the ammunition that killed each of the 13 victims. If it turns out that bullets fired by the paramilitary-style TEC DC-9 did not hit anyone, the gun seller may only face charges of illegal gun peddling rather than being implicated in the murders.

"We hope that we'll have some news soon," prosecutor Mark Pautler said. "As far as arrests, as far as charges, we're still up in the air with that."

Pautler said other people are being interviewed as well, but he described them as witnesses, not suspects. He declined to elaborate.

On Tuesday, agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms visited the Blackjack Pizza shop, where gunmen Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold worked. The agents were investigating whether a pizza deliveryman acted as a middleman in the weapon transaction.

The ATF and the pizza shop managers declined to discuss the inquiry.

On April 20, Harris, 18, and Klebold, 17, killed 12 students and a teacher before committing suicide in one of the worst school shootings in U.S. history. Another 23 were wounded.

A diary found at the home of one of the gunmen indicated the plot had been devised for a year and they planned to kill hundreds with an arsenal of guns and bombs. Investigators have found more than 50 propane and pipe bombs at the school and the teens' homes.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Two men wounded in a neighborhood gun battle stumbled onto the grounds of an elementary school yesterday, heightening parents' fears about school security.

"One collapsed at the door, the other got inside the school. That's what scared a lot of people," said District of Columbia Emergency Management Director Sam Jordan.

The pair were among four men wounded in a gun battle about a block from the J.O. Wilson Elementary School. "The shooting had nothing to do with the school," said Police Commander Kim Dine.

D.C. Public Schools spokeswoman Denise Tann said it should not have been possible for the wounded men to open the school door from the outside. "If the suspect got inside the building then there should have been security on scene to hold them," she said.

I see your true colors

A lot of wacky and weird situations have presented themselves to me since moving in here in the fall, but none of those prepared me for the weirdness I experienced on Monday.

I was sitting at the bus stop, wearing blue jeans and a white T-shirt. Remember the white T-shirt part, it's important. So I was sitting there minding my own business and staring into space when a girl approached me and asked "If I can ask, why are you wearing a white T-shirt?" After checking my ears I asked her to repeat herself. Even when she did, I had no idea how to answer the question.

Brian Lohnes

I wanted to tell her that I was just unimaginative, but I ended up telling her that it was the first thing I grabbed when I got up. She then said, "Oh, I thought you were wearing it to show support for the students of Columbine High School." What?!

Then she just walked away and I was left there trying to make heads or tails out of what had just happened. I never in my wildest dreams considered a white T-shirt to be a statement of any kind. It just goes to show that these days everything means something and to me that really sucks. The originators of this craze were the red ribbons worn to support people stricken with AIDS. This was a good, original and novel idea to raise awareness and money without shoving your thoughts down someone else's throat. Unfortunately, as with most original ideas, it has been taken and overblown 10,000 times.

These days, ribbons are displayed for free speech, animal rights, human rights and even library improvements, and the phenomenon doesn't stop there. People wear certain clothes to support certain organizations or groups of people. I really never had much of an opinion on this topic until it involved me and now I can't stop thinking about it. I am not against this show of support by any means, but I do believe that it has gotten out of hand when a guy can't even wear a white T-shirt without getting questioned. As with most good ideas in this country, it has been pirated and its meaning has been stripped.

It used to mean something when someone had a ribbon on, it used to have real value and a good cause behind it. These days, even the library sells ribbons to get money for the new fence. What used to be a thought-provoking symbol has become common and a lot less meaningful.

I have noticed that a lot of people display ribbons on backpacks and bags, but how many people think about it after they stick it on? It seems that the ribbons are acquired with good, wholesome intentions but they end up worn, tattered and in the case of the library, tied to a fence. I give of the library a lot of credit for taking the initiative to fix the fence, but the ribbons that have been tied there are already worn and tattered, and unfortunately the fence is looking tougher than before. The ribbons are a good idea for a fundraiser but I think people should have been able to wear them.

Back to my own tale of fashion/social statements. I am a pretty simple person. Very rarely do I make any kind of "statement" in a public forum. I, like every other person who has followed the story, am sickened by the events in Littleton, Colo. I am saddened and shocked by the destructive nature of those two kids and the others who were with them. I fear for the future because it will hold more violent and shocking crimes. This doesn't mean that I am going to use my wardrobe as a billboard for my thoughts and feelings. A white shirt is a white shirt, not a deep window into my inner thoughts, and besides, over-analytical people drive me crazy.

It seems to me that people use clothing as an easy and very non-labor intensive form of protest. It is much easier to put on a pair of blue jeans (and hell, even a white shirt) than it is to actually march, yell and verbalize your opinions. Clothing doesn't say very much to many people, myself included. Actions and words go a lot further than a turtleneck. I respect anyone who is willing to stand up for something; too often these days people drift through life with no passionate views on any topics. It's a sign of the times because the world has become dependent on "convenience" and these token gestures are taking a higher precedent than the actual protest because they are quick, easy and painless.

Ribbons still hold special meaning in one respect. The tying of ribbons around trees and other things when our country is at war is special. A house with a ribbon displayed shows that someone's son, daughter, cousin, etc. is off fighting. I remember back in the days of Desert Storm and how those ribbons were especially touching and meaningful.

As I said before, I respect anyone who is willing to stand up for a cause they believe in. The thing is, it needs to be more genuine and heartfelt than a silent ribbon. Every cause has to have voices and people to stand by those voices. Without those voices, no matter how many ribbons you wear, your cause will be forgotten. People can speak, ribbons can't—and a silent cause is quickly a forgotten one.

Taken for granted

As I sit and try to formulate my ideas to write a paper on a subject that was recently brought to my attention, I recall a memory that took place in my childhood. I flash back to my fifth grade class, when we were given an assignment to find out what our nationalities were. This was a simple task for me. I had always been aware of my nationalities, or better put, ethnic composition— Italian and Irish— and I am very proud of it.

On the day our assignment was due, I remember watching other students whose looks expressed embarrassment because they simply did not know their nationalities. I remember thinking to myself that it really didn't matter anyway, we were all born here.

At the age of 22 I now realize why I thought the way I did — my classmates and I were/are all white, and we didn't have to be aware of our nationalities because of the category we all identify with. Little did I know at the age of 10 that one's ethnic composition would play a major role in not only their social acceptance in this country, but also their ability to achieve success. I understand now that this is a privilege. We live in a society that is based upon the white population's rules, norms and values. Yet so many of us are unaware of this privilege.

I find it strange that until recently I never had this awareness. But in the same sense, how many others who come from European descent recognize or want to recognize this privilege? Why would I analyze a privilege granted to me that makes shopping, work and education accessible to my standard of living?

Kathleen Cammarata

Think about it: I was born in this country, and it is acceptable for me to identify myself as an American. However, a friend of mine also born and raised in this country is identified as an African-American. Take it one step further: a person born in raised in Central America is identified as a Latino in the United States, although they may be classified as white in their country.

We are all Americans, but for some reason this country's norms and values are customized by the "white" identity. In the United States we are identified by the genetic makeup that categorizes each of us. Everyone subconsciously categorizes each other and usually one's ethnic composition plays a factor in this identification process.

If categorization is something that exists in all of us, then what does that tell us? It tells us that something must be done to benefit each and every category there is, to give everyone an equal opportunity. Because although we are ruled by the standards of the white identity, the white population does not make up the whole population of citizens in the United States. Being aware of the privilege granted to the white identity I have now begun to question its sources and standards.

Let me give you some examples of white "privilege."

Did you know that a lot of make-up companies only produce foundation in certain shades? Did you know that locally, there are only a few hairdressers that set ethnic hair? Did you know that SAT's are based on the white population, more specifically from the white male perspective? For an individual who is not raised in the white standard, tests like the SAT's are irrelevant in judging their knowledge. There have been studies done to prove this, so why are the SAT's still taken into account in the admissions process?

One might ask, what is this country based upon? Much of our history is told through the white male perspective. We cannot erase the past, but it is important to question what we see and read.

The idea of white privilege to me is a distorted sense of reality. It is clear to the eye that I am not white, nor is my previously mentioned friend black. However, we are socialized as such to abide by this social construction. Therefore, if it is ingrained in us to classify one another, we must create factors that will benefit each and every one of us in order for success to be achieved and not just granted.

In the past two months I have been involved in the process of becoming aware of this privilege, and it's a struggle in itself. My fifth grade assignment had given me a new perspective. As a person, I want to be able to help end oppression; however, it cannot just be focused externally. The aspects of discrimination must be focused internally, and to ask "how I can do this?" is to question my role. My hope is that I have encouraged you to begin and/or continue to question all the influences, reasonings and sources that this society has given you to construct your role.

The cause of a tragedy

In his speech concerning the Littleton massacre, Bill Clinton proposed to teach the children to resolve their problems with words, not weapons. This from the infamous hypocrite out-mastered himself. Just recently he demonstrated a very good example of prevalence of words over weapons by launching the attack on Yugoslavia. And how did he propose to avoid these tragedies in the future? By pushing for more gun control laws, of course.

The man didn't have the guts to admit that his programs to make schools a "violence-free zone" have failed. The Colorado killings are proof of that. His arrogance does not allow him to realize that the best way to make schools safe is not through the "zero-tolerance" policies, but by providing a good security force.

Yes, I know — there was a security guard in Columbine High. And I think that by firing at the maniacs and shifting their attention to him, he gave several students a chance to escape the killing grounds. But there are limits to what one man armed with a revolver can do. As he stated himself, many deaths could have been prevented if he had managed to "drop" the psychopath.

And I'm sure that he could have done that if he had partners and more weapons. Why do you think psychopaths almost never attack a police station or a gun club? Because they know there will be armed people there who would quickly stop their rampage. So maniacs choose other places as their targets — schools and libraries for instance — where they do not expect to find any resistance, because of the nice job the gun-control advocates are doing.

Dennis Drygin

Yes, putting armed guards in every school will be expensive. But if the current administration will stop wasting money for its federal projects which do not work anyway, and will transfer the funds to beef up school security, then I'm sure the budget would be manageable. The other sensible alternative would be to allow teachers who hold Conceal Carry permits to come to school armed. On Oct. 1, 1997 in Pearl, Miss., assistant principal Joel Myrick saved the lives of God knows how many students when he used his own firearm to subdue the gunman who had already killed two students.

Today's debate is heated over what was the main cause of the attack. The media is trying to force you to believe guns are to blame. Let me ask you a simple question: When you are hammering a nail and accidentally strike your thumb, would you put blame on the hammer? Or was it your clumsiness? It's the same thing with weapons. They are just tools; you cannot blame them for the crimes committed by their operators.

I often hear the argument that guns cannot be neutral, that they are evil because their main purpose is to kill people. This is very far from the truth. There are more than 250,000,000 firearms in this country, so even if each of them was used only once for its "main purpose" (to kill), then the majority of the population would be already dead. In contrast, several criminology experts demonstrated that citizens who possess firearms prevent 1.5-2.5 million crimes per year. I'm not mentioning how helpful guns can be to the police and certain other types of work, or some other legal activities: sports, plinking and hunting.

So, who is really responsible for all these tragedies? There are many factors. Is a "gun's availability" one of them? I do not think so. Fifty years ago, guns could be much more easily accessed than today — you could order them by mail. Many boys who went to schools in rural areas used to have a rifle or a shotgun in their cars parked by the school, so they could go hunting after classes, and they didn't shoot each other. Then is it demonstration of violence in modern movies and music that sparks the hatred? I don't know, but I really don't think so.

What I can judge is the way the media covers these tragedies. In its review of the Littleton tragedy, Dallas's central newspaper described two maniacs as victims and provided brief instructions on how to make a pipe bomb. It's no wonder that next day two high school students in Texas brought explosives to school with them. They were caught before they managed to do something drastic, but next time we might not be so lucky.

The government is to blame. It utilizes these incidents in order to push its political agenda, meanwhile failing to prevent them.

In conclusion, I would like to say I sincerely hope that at least some of you people are resisting the media's brainwashing and governmental propaganda, and are instead coming up with realistic ideas that will help to prevent these horrible incidents in the future.

Remember the girl in high school who came back with chicken pox scabs hanging everywhere? And then she showed up with conjunctivitis? Everyone would give her extra room in the hall. God, that girl was sick a lot.

Despite a sore throat, I went to an interview in Cambridge last Friday and shook hands with the big wigs. Halfway through the day I got a strange feeling behind my eyes. Soon, they were pink and puffy. You guessed it…

I was that girl.

My roommate Brenda and I are really sick of people calling at all hours about our cheap-as-crap apartment— it's in the 'burbs in a real house, furnished, a steal at $600. So when students call, they say "Heat and electric included, right?"

No. What is this, 1950? You want some penny candy?

Some people came by and asked if we were throwing in the TV and VCR.

Gary and Alexis are taking over Ed/Op soon… watch out, bad writers— the I.P file awaits…

OK. I wanted that job— the company (a leader in multinational education) has a free happy hour once a month. Unlimited drinks… at a bar on the ground floor. Trasker and I have… the Grad Lounge. Now that's a benefit.

You can tell a lot about a company by its workplace. This one has really great bathrooms, with dim lighting, a mauve color scheme, and stall barriers that go right down to the floor. Classy place to sit on the pooper, especially if it's cheap beer you're drinkin'.

Last call we took, I asked the caller her "race or ethnic origin."

Pause. "White."

"Ooooh. See, we really value diversity. It's actually sort of a communal atmosphere; we all help out with maintenance and stuff. Or like, when my neighbor's kids need watchin', someone's around."

"Um, anything included?"

"Well, the question is more, what can you bring to our community, girl? I tend to do the hedge clippin'. Like, can you snake toilets?"

Speaking of diversity: I look forward to Julie's columns, because they bring the Jew to you, instead of you going to the Jew.

Somehow I know I'm not getting that job. Although they won't forget "Pinkeye Girl" soon. It's highly contagious.

A call the other day:

"Everything's included, right?"

"Sure. It— and the place is huge. Four bedrooms, two bathrooms, a fireplace and free cable. Perfect for two people."

"Wow! When can I see it?"

"Anytime! We love it, and you get used to the stench. I'm telling you."

"Stench? The ad didn't…"

"Septic system's a little backed up. It's a big place, but like I'm sayin', the sewer's only gonna work with two people at most. You don't have guests much, do you? Because, when someone's eatin' cabbage, you get wind of it the next day. Know what I mean? Heh, heh."

UM's Queerfest attracts crowd

By Mary Miles
Collegian Staff

"How many people skipped class today to be here?" Asked Connie Lingus, emcee of Queerfest yesterday. "Professor, I couldn't write that 20-page paper today 'cause I broke a heel and had to go all the way back to New York to get it."

Students who skipped class to work on their tans and participate in Queerfest cheered.

Rainbow balloons blew above students listening to musical acts, eating lunch, looking at tables and socializing on the grass.

Queerfest, an all-day celebration of the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered, queer and ally community, drew in many onlookers with its popular attraction, an inflatable Moonwalk.

"The Moonwalk definitely rocks," commented Eric Carreira, a junior math major.

Douglas Murray, a sophomore social thought and political economy (STPEC) major, sat at a table sponsored by the Amherst International Socialist Organization.

"I think that Queerfest is a good way for the GLBT Community to interact with the school in a way that it normally wouldn't," he said. "It breaks down barriers and is a good way to check out the radical population on campus."

Two young men walked by Doug's table and asked if he was giving away caps.

"Caps?" Murray asked.

"You know, condoms." They replied, pointing in the direction of the Peer Education Table.

"I didn't know that there was a correlation between condoms and socialism" Adrien Hilton, a sophomore STPEC major remarked.

Leslie Fenton, a freshman English and women's studies major said that the Pride Alliance, of which she is a member, had been setting up all morning.

"The high points of my day have been skipping class and hanging a sign out of the SGA window without their knowledge," she said.

Some students bought dresses and shoes from vendors, or checked out the organizations represented. Mutants Against Majority gave away free tapes. Northampton Free Boyz displayed literature and the STPEC program advertised their department. The Radical Student Union had a game entitled "Pin the Tail on the Homophobe," although members did not show up.

"I've had a good day, but I just want to know, where the heck is the Radical Student Union?" asked Sarah Demas, a sophomore STPEC major.

Dylan Larke, a sophomore STPEC major and member of the Pride Alliance, was pleased with Queerfest.

"I think that the turnout was excellent," he said. "We were lucky to have such a beautiful day. I like Queerfest because it forces the rest of the campus community to acknowledge the GLBT community. There was a religious gay over on the Student Union steps trying to draw people away, but no one left. I am definitely pleased."

As the afternoon drew on, music was played by performers like Linee, Tave Hu, Adrianne, Amy and Jess, Danielle Carriveau, Scotland and the Theater Guild. Although there were some problems with the speaker system, the performances went well.

Queerfest also extended into the evening. Comedy acts were performed from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. Julie Goldman, a lesbian who has been doing comedy since she was 14 years old, commented on society while parodying the gay community. Mina Hartong and Bradford Scobie also performed comedy acts. A drag show was performed by Hedda Lettuce, and students, in casual as well as formal attire, danced and relaxed as a disc jockey from Cloud Nine Productions performed.

"I am happy with the way that the entire day went. I may have missed class, but I am raising awareness and making friends. This is one of the best days I have had all year," said freshman communication major Elizabeth Fernandez.

Gay Pride Beer? "Hey, why not?" says Jenn L. Wolper who started the J.Lewis Company, an independent, gay-owned development and marketing company specializing in micro-marketing and promoting distinctive malt beverages and other products to the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and gay-friendly population. The J.Lewis Company's first product, Gay Pride Beer, is a light, English-Style pale ale, brewed by New Hampshire Custom Brewers. Initially it will be distributed as an on-premise beer to bars and restaurants in Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Wolper will channel a percentage of company sales into the J.Lewis Endowment Fund, which she has established in order to award scholarships to individuals and donations to organizations that serve the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender (GLBT) Community. She explains, "I intend to make a little history, have a little fun, and make a difference in the GLBT Community."

GP beer: an intro

Tonight at the Grotto, Jen Wolper will introduce Gay Pride Beer. The launch will open the sixth annual Gay Pride Weekend in Northampton, and will mark the first time in history that a beer label specifically uses the word "gay" in its title.

"With hate crimes on the rise and gay rights being challenged all over the country and the world, we intend to use our position to reverse discrimination and promote human rights," explained Jen Wolper, president and CEO of the J. Lewis company, founder of Gay Pride Beer.

Wolper anticipates a healthy response from the GLBT community, strategizing that the "buy local" theme will translate into "buy gay."

"By keeping our money in the community, we can continue to develop our own economic highways and walk to enhance our collective quality life," she said.

Wolper says that whenever a gay person chooses a product provided by a member of the Community, her or she is affirming the group's dignity, pride and visibility.

Wolper's idea came to her at the Grotto in November, 1997. She wondered why there was not a gay beer when she was selecting a beverage.

Beer sales are growing at a rate of 1 percent per year, according to the Alcoholic Beverages and Tobacco survey.

From articles that I have read and personal experiences, I know that drugs and alcohol are sometimes a big problem within the young GLBT community. I don't know if I like the idea of someone capitalizing on "Gay Beer."

When I first heard of it, it seemed to me like the gay equivalent of those American Spirit cigarettes, which advertise being "all natural," but are still really bad for you. By buying them, we can escape buying Marlboros, but smaller companies are still profiting from giving us lung cancer.

I guess if you are buying beer anyway, and gay beer is the same price as whatever else you are buying, you can support a lesbian who still give some money to gay charities. The fact of her being a lesbian aside, many people like the idea of buying local products, and may as well opt for Gay Beer over Rolling Rock.

A fax that I got read, "With 9 to 12 percent of the U.S. population gay or lesbian, according to government statistics, and having a higher discretionary income than other groups, Wolper and her advisors predict that the J Lewis company will be able to capture and retain a viable segment of the beer market."

None of the lesbians I know have a "higher discretionary income" than the rest of the population. I know there are many lesbian professionals, but I think it is ridiculous to assume that they constitute the majority of lesbians.

The company was named after Wolper's Russian immigrant grandfather, Lewis Wolper, a respected entrepreneur who owned large sections of Springfield and Amherst in the late 1930s and helped others get started in business. Wolper says "Even though he died before I was born, he inspired me to create a socially-conscious business and manage from my heart."

It's worth a try.

Human liberation

I feel very lucky to have been a teenager coming out in the 1990s. Ellen came out on national TV around the same time that I came out to my family: Jerry said, "There's nothing wrong with that!" on Seinfeld; and now, there's even a gay Teletubby. I live in the "lesbian capital," and have been fortunate in my treatment by others.

A lot of lesbians I have met in Northampton seem to have an almost apolitical stance, despite the political currents of the five colleges. However, it isn't just Neho that makes me feel this way. I get the feeling that a lot of queer people feel as though the gay liberation battle has been fought for them, or that it is "old news."

There was public outrage across the country following Matthew Shepard's murder. At the University of Wyoming, where Shepard attended college, the football team voted to wear helmet decals symbolizing nonviolence to protest Shepard's murder. The gay student group Shepard was a member of reported that it couldn't keep up with the demand for "Straight but not Narrow" buttons during gay awareness week. Shepard's death even prompted a columnist at a Wyoming newspaper to come out. Vigils took place all over the country. There was almost some glimmer of hope that it would be part of a dying breed of hate crimes. Matthew Shepard wasn't the first gay man murdered for his sexuality, but this strong display of support was encouraging.

However, even with such extreme support by a large part of the heterosexual community, many articles have been written by writers identifying as "post-gay." The post-gay movement consists of upper-class academics who believe that by having queer people organizing against oppression in traditional ways, they are portrayed as "victims." Post-gay writers believe that the queer community needs to change its politics in order to go along with the conservative agenda.

For example, post-gay politics says that gays should not demand legalization of gay marriage because of fundamental civil rights, but because they appeal to the conservative support for the family and the military. I see these "post- gay" politics even here at school, by people who don't identify as such. Many students tone down their politics, and rightly so. If you are white and upper class, perhaps you will be guaranteed employment after graduation, and feel that being queer does not separate you from similarly-classed people. Perhaps students feel that the liberation war has been won. However, despite theses attitudes, the statistics speak for themselves.

In 39 states it is legal to fire a gay worker from his/her job. Twenty states maintain sodomy laws, and since Clinton instated the "Don't ask, don't tell" policy in the military, discharges of gay service members have increased 70 percent.

Why is this happening? None of the gay politics floating around address the majority of gays and lesbians. All of them reflect the interests of the "gay middle class," rather than the interests of the working class majority. My friend told me a joke which asked, "What's the difference between a lesbian and a dyke?" the answer being, "Forty thousand dollars a year, and damn it, I'm a DYKE!" My friend is a senior who is graduating this year, and wonders what employment she will find when she gets out of school.

The rumor of gay people as a part of the middle class is a strong one. When I was in high school I remember a teacher telling me that all gay men were white collar professionals, and would take over the middle class because they never have any kids and therefore have a lot of money to invest. Myths like this hide the fact that the majority of queer people are working class.

Still, fully one-third of self-identified gays and lesbians voted Republican in the 1998 midterm election, according to exit polls.

Each socially-oppressed group is divided by class. Class interests divide the oppressed, and working class gays have more to gain by fighting alongside the working class people than they do from uniting with ruling class sections of the gay community with different agendas. Most of the time the divisions inside the working class seem too powerful for these groups to unite.

There is a need for all oppressed groups to work together and fight for justice. The same people who beat Matthew Shepard are the people committing hate crimes against African-Americans.

The activism following Matthew Shepard's death comes when public support for gay rights stands at an all-time high and when increased numbers of people — from workers at UPS to UMass students who marched for Mumia — are joining the fight. We need a movement for human liberation, not restricted to gays and lesbians. In order to end injustices on all levels, groups must struggle together to succeed, and the gay and lesbian community must concentrate its efforts not just within the community, but by building allies as well.

Throw away those old razors

By Mary Miles
Collegian Staff

On Wednesday, April 28, the Feminist Majority Leadership Alliance sponsored a discussion on leg shaving for "Throw Out Your Razors Day."

Gina Hall, president of the alliance, began the discussion by asking the women in attendance to describe why they started shaving, and experiences they have had dealing with this issue.

"I was sitting in gym class in seventh or eighth grade with hairy legs when a girl asked me if my mom let me shave. That's the first time anyone had commented to me about shaving," Hall said.

Marjorie Patnaud said she was encouraged not to shave by her mother, but was made fun of by girls at her camp for not shaving.

Rebecca Sablo commented on her experience as a strong feminist who has made a conscious decision to shave.

"I have thought about stopping, but I like the feeling of a clean shave," she said. "Who knows, maybe someday I will stop."

Women brought up the fact that shaving is part of an oppressive patriarchal system that forces women to shave and applauds men for their hairiness.

Hall commented: "It's a big issue in feminist communities, the hairy-legged feminist being really radical. Shaving politicizes women's bodies. It challenges a whole system. People who don't find the issue important may not realize that."

Sarah O'Brien discussed the lack of importance given to the topic of women deciding not to shave.

"When the feminist community dismisses the topic of body hair it shows a problem, because growing out your hair challenges the way that people think about women in a visible, basic way," she said. "People use body hair to construct femininity. Armpit and leg hair on girls scares a lot of people who are afraid of women crossing gender barriers."

Hall also said that hairy legs sometimes have a queer association, and comic relief was brought to the group when shaving your bikini line was mentioned.

"A lot of employers still may not want female employees to have visible body hair, which puts feminists in a tough position when looking for a job," commented Vanessa Serotta.

Patnaud said men on her floor offered to buy her an electric razor if she promised to use it.

"People have a real problem with this on campus. Articles have been written by pro-shavers in the Collegian, and we have faced opposition tabling in the Campus Center," Adrien Hilton said.

Out on campus

Last month a panel of four out queer professors spoke to queer students and allies in the Campus Center Auditorium about the stipulations of coming out in the workplace, as well as to give a faculty approach to being out at the University of Massachusetts.

The first professor to speak was Deborah Carlin, a professor in the English department who teaches such classes as Queer Culture and American Realism. She said that she did not plan on coming out to her students explicitly until she read homophobic comments which had been written about her in the elevator. This made her decide to come out, and she talked about her feelings on this.

"The most important thing is to normalize it, to straight, gay, lesbian, or whatever students — to normalize it, and make it non-toxic. I'm your professor, I'm queer, and if you have any issues with that, you will have to deal with them."

Helen Page, a professor from the anthropology department, was the next to speak. As a man who used to be differently gendered, he said that he is not "out" because he has never been "in." When he was biologically female, he identified as a straight man rather than a lesbian, and now that he is both physically and mentally a man, he identifies as straight. He told students that he refuses to deny his past, and continues to tell people that he was once female, even though people cannot tell that he is transgendered on their own.

Dr. Page spoke about the interrelation of different forms of oppression. Oppression by gender and race are inseparable, he said. He spoke about the fact that for years white people have organized against African-Americans, and that they have been doing the same thing to the queer community. He spoke of gender discrimination within the African-American community. He also talked about messages in rap songs and movies, and how filmmakers relate race in a gender context.

Samuel Delaney spoke of how "formative" experiences may oppress more "ordinary" experiences in Queer culture. He read excerpts from his book Time Square Red, Time Square Blue. He spoke about the "Disney-ization" of Times Square in New York City, and how more and more X-rated movie theaters have been pulled down. The excerpt described his experiences bringing a woman into a queer theater, and the audience's response to this.

He also spoke of his experiences living in a "welfare hotel" with a large transgendered population. He said jokingly that he saw six-feet-tall women in the elevator with feather boas all the time, and thought nothing of it. Delaney said that he "stopped wondering what gender people were. People always think that it will be a question, but if you can learn that it doesn't matter, you can learn anything."

A woman in the audience commented on Delaney's excerpt, which contained sexually-graphic details. The woman questioned why he read this particular excerpt at the panel, and said she "felt assaulted." Delaney responded with an apology, and said that some young gay men's experiences are highly sexual when they are coming out. Delaney said that none of the panel members represented the entire community; each could only relay one experience.

Ann Harrington was the last professor to speak. She said that she was never explicit that she wanted to talk about queer issues in her classes. She felt that she didn't want to come out explicitly because heterosexuals don't have to, she said. Her intention was to make sure that enough references to her being gay were thrown out in classes.

Students were encouraged to comment on the professors' stories during a question and answer period, and a graduate student spoke of his experiences teaching a theater class in which he found students to be very supportive. Even though people assumed he was gay, verbalizing it made it easier for many students to accept his sexuality.

"By coming out, I give students the benefit of the doubt that they will be accepting," he said. "By doing so, I get to be myself, and they get to experience a queer person."

It's that time of year again! Spring is definitely the season for pride marches. Make sure to check out the Northampton Pride March tomorrow at noon in the town center. Boston Area Gay and Lesbian Youth (BAGLY) will also be holding a march on May 15, followed by a queer prom. The prom is a lot of fun, complete with formal attire, a dee jay, and free condoms and dental dams. I have attended for the past two years, and they're definitely worth checking out.

Although this is the last page of the semester, queer voices still need to be heard! Drop off any editorials, opinions or articles you may have at the Collegian, and say something before summer gets here!

'Fill the Hill' features 12

Seattle's Living Daylights will perform on the main stage at 7:40 p.m. at the Orchard Hill and Central Residential Areas' "Fill the Hill '99" on Saturday.

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

Orchard Hill and Central Residential Area governments team up to bring UMass "Fill the Hill '99" tomorrow from noon to 10 p.m. The event is free and open to the public and features three stages and 12 bands. Tonight the "Pack the Bowl" dance will be held in Orchard Hill, providing a great way to kick-off the weekend.

Hall's Corner Band
Main Stage — 4:00 p.m.

Boston's Hall's Corner Band has sold out both the Middle East and the Paradise with their acoustic driven rock 'n' roll that combines funk and jazz. The band's lead guitarist and principle songwriter, Andrew Corbett hails from the Virginia college music scene, as can be seen in the band's uplifting melodies and harmonious jams.

The band has grown musically since its 1997 debut release, Take Me To The Outside Land, as shown on this year's solid four-track EP Stone. Another full-length effort is just a few more months away.

LarryLand
Main Stage — 5:05 p.m.

After achieving cult status throughout Europe, Denmark's LarryLand was signed to Pacific West Records and released the critically acclaimed debut, Travel Fever. The first cut of this album, "Anybody Up There?" became a top 10 radio hit.

Presently, LarryLand is on a six week national U.S. tour that has brought them everywhere from the Georgia Theater to the Higher Ground. On this tour they have been able to perform with both Cowboy Mouth and the Cherry Poppin' Daddies, along with playing at a SXSW showcase.

With the European Press hailing the band's music as "rock as God must have created it," many U.S. labels are interested in signing this Denmark superstar.

Jiggle the Handle
Main Stage — 6:10 p.m.

Last summer Jiggle the Handle played the H.O.R.D.E. tour and tomorrow they will fill the hill. The evening main stage festivities will be a CD release party of sorts for the emerging jam-band. Yesterday marked the official release of the band's second album, In It Again, which provides 14 studio tracks of the band's eclectic sound.

With a record contract in the works, and Jiggle already sharing the stage with artists ranging from Strangefolk to moe. one has to wonder what the band's next move will be.

Living Daylights
Main Stage — 7:40 p.m.

The Living Daylights were featured in Dean Budnick's "Jam-Bands," performed at a SXSW Showcase, and has opened for acts ranging from Maceo Parker to Gordon Stone. This Seattle instrumental act's thrilling live performances and large college airplay has led to the peak of the band's sophomore release, 300 Pound Cat, at number four on the CMJ Charts.

Rane
Main Stage — 9:10 p.m.

Rane's distinct sound offers a unique blend of modern and psychedelic progressive music that regularly grooves the Webster Theater in Hartford. They have performed with the likes of Percy Hill, Acoustic Junction, The Samples and Mighty Purple.

Their current release is entitled Ar War with the Moon, which demonstrates the band's innovation and keen interest in a wide range of music genres.

Orchard Hill Local Stage

Ruby Dune starts things off at noon, with Hurricane Dave performing at 1 p.m. Tave Hu steps on stage at 2 p.m., while Joint Custody headlines at 3 p.m.

Central Local Stage

Tuscan Groove and two other bands will perform between 1 p.m. and 3:45 p.m.

Lowdown on season finales

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

It's finale time in TV land again, and while some shows are gearing up for cliffhanger endings to lead you into next seasons, others are planning to walk off into the sun, and never be seen again. Perhaps the most interesting time of year for television series is during May sweeps time, when some shows not only need to show their best stuff to survive, but also to be remembered over the summer, so when it comes time to turn your TV on next fall, you will know what to look for.

With the wide-array of season finales that will take place in the next few weeks, most of which have already been shot, there's going to be a few uniting themes among all of them — get people to watch, sell advertisement time and, if there's any effort left, entertain! After doing a lot of research over the past few weeks, I have found numerous sources reporting on what certain shows are doing in order to say farewell. The easiest way to break these up are by the ones you will never see again, and the ones that will surely be back next year.

The Grand Finales

What a run it's been for "Home Improvement." The extremely popular series is getting the most hype this year, because it is finally leaving the airwaves after a long nine- year run. And according to reports from the set, the hour long series finale will definitely go out with a bang. The plot seems to be something about Allen's character, Tim "The Tool Man Taylor" giving up his popular show "Tool Time" to move from Detroit to Washington D.C. because his wife, Jill (Patricia Richardson), will take a job offer. What I can't understand is why there have been so many series finales with this exact plot.

We saw the same thing a few years ago on "Growing Pains," and again on "Who's the Boss," I'm sure there have been others as well. I have not been able to find any reports on what the status of the three Taylor children will be in the final episode. As you may know, teen heartthrob — and annoying little turd — Jonathan Taylor Thomas, left the show last year to make the mega-Hollywood hit I'll Be Home For Christmas, (in case you didn't pick up on the sarcasm, I'll Be Home For Christmas was not a mega-Hollywood hit, although after seeing it, some people were reported as willing to pay for a chance to hit JTT.)

I have not heard whether or not Thomas will return to the show, but my gut instinct tells me that even he is not conceited enough to turn his back on the show that made him famous. Through the years, "Home Improvement" has gained a huge following and won several awards, including numerous "Best Actress In a Comedy Series" awards at the Emmys for Patricia Richardson. Lately, "Home Improvement" has become a poster child for wearing out your welcome, and had been downright awful. However, I'm sure the series finale will be something special. The final episode of "Home Improvement" airs on Tuesday, May 25.

The big news coming out of NBC almost all revolves around "Mad About You." The award-winning series will have its last episode on Monday May 24, will include such guest stars as Tim Conway and Janeane Garafalo will leave a huge void in NBC's Monday night line-up, since it has been the top series on that night for the past five years. The show has gained a substantial loyal following that will certainly miss the show when it leaves the air.

The big exit on FOX is a show that has had horrendous ratings in the past few years. On May 24 (yes the same night as the "Mad About You" series finale, it boggles my mind as well) "Melrose Place" will close down forever. The nighttime soap opera, which did gain a big following after the success of "Beverly Hills 90210" a few years back, has since died and vanished off the face of the earth. "Melrose Place" will return for a series finale which will involve some sort of a funeral. As for who dies, and why, don't ask me, I hate that show!

Another show that is leaving is one that you may not have heard from in a while. "Mystery Science Theater 3000" used to have a pretty strong following on Comedy Central, but when the ratings fell, they sent it to The Sci-Fi Channel. After the Sci-Fi channel picked it up, it has pretty much has not made much of a name for itself. The early episodes of MST3000 are hilarious, and it even spawned a film. There's no definite time when the show will be taken off the air, but it at least deserves recognition, if not a formal good-bye.

The Not-So-Grand Finales

Last year, "Friends" traveled to London. Seemingly this year's budget was a little smaller because they'll be staying in the country. Apparently, Joey (Matt LeBlanc) gets a very good acting role in Las Vegas, and the rest of the gang will travel along with him. The biggest question here is obviously: will Chandler (Matthew Perry) and Monica (Courtney Cox) get married? My guess is that there will be a huge cliffhanger ending like there has been in the past two years, and we will not know the answer to this question until next September.

I'm sure a lot of you have been keeping up with the lesbian plot that's been building on "Party of Five." The rest of the season will pretty much be centralized around Neve Campbell's character Julia, and her relationship with her Stanford Professor, played by Olivia d'Abo. The relationship is getting "Party of Five" the ratings, and that's all FOX cares about.

The most interesting news about season finales has been with "Dawson's Creek." All I'm going to say about the season finale is that I heard from an unnamed source that there will be a cliffhanger ending that involves a one-word act known as suicide. That's all I'm going to reveal, you'll just have to watch to find out who the culprit is.

The end of the year is coming, and the TV world is ready. Every show has a finale, and some shows are leaving forever. Check back next week for the season finale of "Tube Notes."

Crew prepares for Syracuse

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

The No. 13 Massachusetts women's crew team is not done for the season just yet. In response to UMass coach Jim Dietz's address to the team on its underachievment, the Minutewomen bounced back with its fourth straight title in A-10 last weekend. Suddenly, the playoff hope comes very much alive.

This weekend, the Minutewomen will travel to upstate New York to compete against its first Big East opponent of the year, No. 19 Syracuse.

Syracuse is currently on a hot streak after coming out on top in the Georgetown Invitational tournament. Their varsity eight have posted an impressive time with 6:41.1, which is nearly 10 seconds ahead of UMass's varsity eight's performance in the A-10 Championship race.

That, however, doesn't really mean anything. There has been a pattern in past results which suggests that the Minutewomen are always able to pull it together to make an end-of-year run. The best example is when they beat Virginia last year in the NCAA.

"We might have a slow start in the beginning of the season," Heather Walker, a key member in the varsity eight said. "But we have always been able to race better at the end of year."

Hopefully this will be true for this year's squad, for UMass is anything but a disappointment before the A-10 tournament. Though they resurge to pull out a decisive tourney win, their biggest problem comes from within. As Dietz has suggested, the team doesn't work well as a whole and the varsity eight has not been spectacular as predicted.

"It will be a test," Walker said. "It isn't about how much power we got [now]. It's more like ourselves [and] the team chemistry — if we can work well together."

Although Syracuse is a tough opponent to play against at the end of the year, the Minutewomen, on paper, are far more superior than their opponent in individual power. To win, the Minutewomen have to work in perfection while bring out individual potential. They need to overwhelm the Orangewomen to show the NCAA committee that UMass is a deserved and worthy member to earn the invitation to California. And perhaps, the team understands the urgency.

"This meet is very important. It will decide whether or not we will get the team bid in NCAA," Walker said. "We have to win."

If winning the A-10 is their hope at salvaging the season, the Minutewomen will hope to use Syracuse as a springboard for their tickets to an NCAA bid in California this May.

Owls in Philadelphia by a 6-5 score in a torrential downpour and thunderstorm that, at one point, caused nearly a 20 minute delay.

Still, that game would be only hypothetical if the two teams don't advance past Saturday. While Temple handily drubbed Duquesne, 17-9, when they played on April 11, the first-ever V-Tech–UMass game was much closer.

"It's pretty clear we have to take it one game at a time," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "We are preparing for Virginia Tech. We beat them once, we can beat them again. We have to go in focused and ready to play."

Against the Hokies, the Minutewomen exploded out to a 7–4 lead in the second half due to a three-goal outburst by the trio of Sara MacNabb, Rachel Ingraffea and Noelle Gorski, but couldn't hold on for a decisive victory, as Virginia Tech fought back into contention.

"We're looking for a more solid defensive game from our kids," McClellan said. "Against them, we are looking for more goals. That's the constant mission; for our kids to shoot more."

Ingraffea, who scored two goals in the 8–7 win, will be looked to again cause problems for the opposition this weekend.

"We have been working hard on getting Rachel to the cage more and she's our quickest kid — certainly an advantage," McClellan said.

If the Minutewomen proceed to the title game and Duquesne upsets Temple, UMass can look back on a 9–5 win over the Dukes on April 25 to support their championship cause.

Duquesne, who snuck into the A–10 tourney with a 2–3 conference mark, will cause problems for their opponents with Meghan Hungate, who has recorded over 60 total points this season. Teammates Jessica McGarry and Katie Harner can also boast point totals over 40, as the Dukes sported an impressive 11–5 overall record.

Temple's passion and desire might depend on their guiding light, superstar Nicole Ross. Ross shouldered most of the Owls' offensive burden in their earlier game against Massachusetts, scoring three of the team's six goals — without a single assist.

McClellan will send co-captains Melissa Anderson and Laura Korutz, Gorski and Ingraffea to counteract the other three teams' offensive outputs.

"Noelle is rock solid," McClellan said. "She puts a ball or two in the cage per game. She's a good defender and we count on her — certainly in draws. She is tough and hustles, she has strong stick skills and handles the ball well under pressure."

In the cage, Massachusetts has sophomore Jen Nardi, who comfortably leads the conference in both goals against average and save percentage.

"We hope she comes ready to go," McClellan said of Nardi. "We hope she continues to step up like she's been doing."

"It was special for her," Sortino said. "Rutgers is a good team. She had a great day and she deserved to."

With two non-conference victories over the Scarlett Knights, the Minutewomen improved to 36–8 overall, and remained at 11–1 in the Atlantic 10. Rutgers, whose record hovered just above the .500 mark before the double-header, fell to a mediocre 24–24 with the pair of defeats.

What came as a great surprise to Sortino was the manner in which her UMass squad cruised to its two wins, the second of which came as the result of the eight–run mercy rule. The Minutewomen played perhaps their most sluggish double–header last Saturday at Rhode Island, and escaped with a come–back victory in the final at bat of game two.

Although disappointed that her team struggled against the Rams, Sortino was optimistic that the late–game momentum would carry over to yesterday's two wins over the Scarlett Knights.

"As good as we were today, we were that awful Saturday [at Rhode Island]," Sortino said. "We had a great come–from–behind win. I think we built on that and it carried over into today."

UMass did most of its damage of game one in the opening frames. After George singled in a pair of runs in the first inning, the Minutewomen had increased their lead to 4–0 by the end of the second. Sophomore Nikki Faessler scored on an error by Rutgers catcher Karen Pelky. The next UMass batter, freshman Teri Rooney, drove in Kiley Scofield with a base hit to right field.

The Minutewomen added two more insurance runs in the bottom of the fifth for pitcher Danielle Henderson, who needed little run support. The UMass strike out queen fanned 15 Rutgers' hitters in game one, yielding only two hits and no runs. With the shut–out, Henderson (23–2) extended her scoreless–innings streak to an unprecedented 92. She also catapulted her season strikeout total to 340.

In the second contest, sophomore Carrie Jeffries held the Scarlett Knights scoreless through five innings before the mercy rule was invoked. Jeffries (12–3) increased her season shut–out total to six during a three–hit, no–walk masterpiece.

In addition to George, Faessler was also exceptional at the plate. The junior catcher ripped three hits between both contests, including an RBI double in the third inning of game two. Senior second baseman Mandy Galas, who leads the Minutewomen with a batting average over .360, went three for five on the afternoon and scored three runs.

Riding a 16–game winning streak, UMass will host A–10 rival Virginia Tech, Sunday at noon at Totman Field. The Hookies are currently undefeated in conference play and will come to Amherst having won 22 straight.

The Minutewomen won both meetings at Virginia Tech last season, and could all but wrap the conference title with a pair of wins.

Kraft & Patriots still looking for deal

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. — New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft met with Gov. John G. Rowland at the state Capitol last night for the first time since legislative leaders in Massachusetts announced a plan designed to keep the team.

Earlier in the day, state Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said he was preparing to sue the National Football League for actively promoting Massachusetts' bid to keep the Patriots, despite an agreement Kraft had signed to come to Connecticut.

The lawsuit would charge the NFL with interfering with the agreement between Connecticut and Kraft, and with restraining competition, by trying to block a move by the Patriots to Hartford. "The NFL is proactively intervening to lure the team away from an agreement the team has with Connecticut," Blumenthal said. "We could sue for hundreds of millions of dollars."

Blumenthal referred to a visit by NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue to Boston last week during which he met with leading lawmakers.

UMass tennis finishes year with loss to BU

By Matt O'Neill
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team finished its spring season on the road when it travelled to Boston University on Wednesday.

The Minutewomen ended their spring season with a loss to the Terriers, who were ranked eighth in the East region. The 7–2 loss dropped their spring record to 8–7 (15–9 overall).

UMass was able to win the first singles spot but was unable to win any points in any of the other spots. Helena Horak got the sole victory, when she beat BU's Jennifer Momil in a three–match set by scores of 6–2, 2–6, 6–4.

"Helena played great against one of the more highly– ranked players in the East," coach Judy Dixon said. "Beating her [Momil] is possibly one of the bigg– t wins in UMass history."

Dixon was very pleased with the way her team played, despite the lack of wins against the Terriers.

"This match showed our growth as a program," she said. "This year every match was contested, three years we had only won one point, and last year, we only won a doubles game."

The duo of Gillian Kane and Jackie Braunstein got the only doubles win for the Minutewomen. They beat BU's team of Adrianna Babisova and Ning Hunt by a score of 8– 6.

"I was glad to see the No. 3 doubles win," Dixon said. "It was great way for Jackie and Gillian to end their careers with a win."

Dixon was pleased with her team's performance over the spring season.

"I was really pleased with the team this year. I thought that we made great strides," she said. "In the past years, we were a step behind the other programs [in the East region]. now we are only maybe a half or a quarter step behind them."

The outlook for next year's team is bright, according to Dixon.

"We should be very good next year," Dixon said. "Especially since Ola had an off year this year, and with the addition of one of the most highly–touted seniors in the New England area."

■ A-10

indeed very different than last year. Two impressive freshmen pitchers have propelled Virginia Tech to a record of 50–12 and a perfect 12–0 in the A–10. Both ballers are ranked in the top 50 in the nation for their low ERA's.

The Minutewomen are a changed team as well. Seven freshmen have contributed to the 1999 campaign. First baseman Cherra Wheeler is one homerun away from tying the UMass single season record and she is batting a blistering .350. Center fielder Teri Rooney is also having an impressive rookie year in her own regard, driving in 27 runs this year.

Yet, what Sunday boils down to is the seniors who will be honored. Co–captains Becky George and Danielle Henderson will play in their penultimate home doubleheader. Henderson has won 20 games in a row and has shut her opponents out for the last 92 consecutive innings. The UMass strikeout queen is shattering records while showing the nation why she is one of the greatest pitchers in the country.

It is only fitting that the final home conference game will come against the league–leading Hookies to determine the No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 conference.

"The No. 1 seed is on the line," said Sortino. "These are the games that are fun for us. As a coach I look forward to great competition. I hope it is great UMass softball. We are not going to change our game plan for Virginia Tech. We are going to keep doing what we have been doing."

This season UMass softball has been synonymous with success. The last two dominating home victories over Rutgers yesterday put UMass in a good position for the conference games this weekend. The team is peaking as it heads into the biggest two conference games of the season.

"I think our kids are in good place," said Sortino. "If I could pick a way to be going into an important weekend this is where I want to be."

Although the teams have changed their looks from the 1998 campaign, Virginia Tech will be well aware of the dominating pitcher nicknamed "Harry" Henderson. Number 44 currently sports the second–best ERA in the nation. The only pitcher ahead of her is Amanda Scott, the hurler she outdueled 1–0 earlier this year.

"They haven't seen us," said Sortino. "We haven't seen them, but they have seen Harry. There are not too many teams in our conference that don't come after her with a vengeance. She is a hell of a competitor."

Minutewomen Notes: Although the schedule states that the game is at 1 p.m., Sunday's game has been moved up to 12 p.m. and will be played as usual on the Totman softball field.

■ women's track

In order to finish on top the Minutewomen will need strong performances from their throwers, Rhianna DuCruz, Nellie Giffune, Shannon Hamilton, Sharyn Harrison, Carole LaPlante and Alison Tostevin. They must score points if the Minutewomen are to come back to Amherst with the crown.

ATTENTION SPORTS WRITERS!!!

There is a mandatory meeting on Monday, May 3 at 6:00 p.m. to discuss our plans to write in the fall. Fall beats will be assigned and suggestions will be taken. If you can't attend, contact Bryan Smith or Brett Mauser.

■ Negus

to attest to that.

"Jay is a very composed player who has a great grasp of the game," Cannella said. "He is a great leader on this team, because he is so unselfish and that helps us infinitely."

Entering this season, Negus responsibility as a leader was raised to a new level since the make–up of the Minutemen this year included 10 freshmen and 17 sophomores.

"This was a tough year for the five seniors," Negus said. "We tried to set an example as best we could."

Unlike last year, when the Minutemen fielded a loaded senior class and the team raced out to a 6–0 start, this year's team struggled early and has been unable to fully rebound.

"We knew this was going to be a learning process for a lot of the guys," Negus said. "We would have liked to have clicked a little earlier and been more successful as a unit."

Despite the disappointing senior year, Negus has been able to taste some success at the collegiate level. Perhaps the pinnacle was a first–round 6–4 UMass triumph over Hofstra in the 1997 NCAA tournament.

On a personal level, Negus chipped in with outstanding individual efforts including a four–goal game against Harvard, and a three–goal, two–assist afternoon at Holy Cross last season.

Despite these highlights, a season in which UMass stands at 4–7 couldn't help but be terribly disappointing to a team guy like Negus.

"This has been very tough on [Negus] and the other seniors as well," Cannella said. "It's particularly upsetting because he has been on successful teams, but I give him a lot of credit for coming out every day and giving everything he's got."

Along those lines, Negus has not given up hope and will look to play a major factor in tonight's heated match–up with Syracuse, and the season finale at Brown.

"I'm excited for the last few games," Negus said. "I have a lot of friends and family coming to see my last home game, and this is the last chance for the seniors to sort of make up for what went wrong this season.

Five College Community Calendar

FRIDAY, APR. 30

Display — A Five-College clothesline of shirts will be displayed from 10 a.m.–5 p.m. Students and staff are being asked to contribute T-shirts to acknowledge and support survivors of violence and to give victim/survivors an opportunity to acknowledge their own experiences with violence. Call 545-3611 if interested in making your own T- shirt to add to the project.

Service — There will be a Kesher–style Shabbat service at 6 p.m. in the Hillel House. A free Shabbat dinner will follow.

Writers — Wilderness writers will "roam the forests of Amherst and discover the poetry of it" from 2-4 p.m. in the Hillel House. All are welcome.

SATURDAY, MAY 1

Comedy — MISSION IMPROVable will perform an improvisational comedy show at 8 p.m. in room 163 of the Campus Center. All are welcome.

SUNDAY, MAY 2

Theater — Amherst College Cabaret presents the musical "Once on this Island" at 8 p.m. at the Amherst College Campus Center Auditorium in free but seating is limited.

MONDAY, MAY 3

Celebration — There will be a Lag B'Omer bash at 6:30 p.m. at the Hillel House. There will be food, fun and a bonfire. Everyone is welcome.

Vigil — There will be a candlelight vigil for the 12 Springfield women murdered by a serial killer, and for all the survivors and victims of violence against women at 7 p.m. at the Campus Pond.

Workshop — There will be a workshop on contraception and safer sex at 3 p.m. in room 302 of University Health Services.

NOTICES

Community — The UMass Mediation and Negotiation Team is available to help students and faculty with problems or conflicts. Call 545-3622 to learn more about free mediation and facilitation services, or if you are interested in becoming a member of the Team.

Community — The Latin American Cultural Center is open Sunday to Wednesday from 7 p.m.–midnight. The LACC is located above the Munchs Store in the Hampden Building in Southwest. Call 545-2073 for more information.

Contest — The Campus Center Student Union Commission is having a T-shirt design contest. The design should show dedication to students and an ability to govern in the Campus Center/Student Union complex with student demands as a principle motivation. It should include "UMass Amherst Campus Center/Student Union Commission" shown clearly, and should express something about a desire to be a better and louder voice for students. For more information call 545-0148. There will be a $50 cash prize for the chosen design.

Information — The Alcohol and Drug Education Program at UHS offers general information, referral and training workshops in room 248 of UHS weekdays from 8:30 a.m.–5 p.m. Call 577-5181 for more details.

Scholarship — The USIA, the J. William Fulbright Scholarship Board and the Institute of International Education announce the opening of the 2000-2001 competition for Fulbright and related grants for graduate study or research abroad, in academic fields and performing arts. Contact Professor Susan Whitbourne in 610 Goodell for more information.

PSAs are public service announcements printed daily. To submit an PSA, please send a press release containing all pertinent information, including the name and phone number of the contact person to the Collegian, c/o the Managing Editor by noon the previous day.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Spend time out of doors today and you'll realize that there's more in store for you in the coming days and weeks than you had remembered.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — The time has come for you to stop making excuses and begin making amends. Others are depending on you for more then you're currently providing.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You are likely to attract considerable attention today. Strength and stamina are reaching a peak. You can take on more responsibility.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be unusually defensive today, even a little paranoid. Take care you don't fire up the opposition unintentionally at this time.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You mustn't let secondary or peripheral activities sap your strength today, or erode your enthusiasm for those bigger things you have in store.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You're not one to take things too seriously today, and you're not about to tolerate those who insist that you take on a sober demeanor.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Capricorn natives are most likely to express surprise or dissatisfaction today as a result of your words or actions. Increase communication.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Today is the day to take advantage of your personal standing. Certain privileges should be open to you, and you alone today.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You are intent on satisfying your own needs today. Take care you don't let your current selfishness become too aggressive or transparent.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You must take care that you don't begin intruding on others today. You'll know when it is appropriate to make that call or drop in for a visit.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You'll enjoy an opportunity to express yourself in ways you have only imagined in the past. Numerous doors are opening up for you at this time.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You're wanting everyone around you to give you all the answers today, but you will be perfectly able to figure them out for yourself.

Baseball drops Beanpot

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It was only two pitches, two pick-offs and two base runners thrown out. That was all.

Those three elements were the difference between the Massachusetts baseball team's (22-13, 10-2 Atlantic 10) seventh consecutive win at the annual baseball Beanpot Tournament and what actually happened — a 4-2 loss in the championship game against Boston College (19-18) yesterday at Fenway Park.

Relinquishing just one inconsequential error and three walks, the Minutemen demonstrated how close contests are decided by details sometimes considered minute.

Brian Hourigan hurled five innings of solid work for UMass. The freshman struck out two BC batters and walked two while allowing a pair of runs on six hits. Sophomore Craig Szado relieved Hourigan and pitched almost a mirror image for the loss.

"Brian did a heck of a job," UMass Coach Mike Stone said. "There was just a couple of mistakes. Hopefully he will be able to start throwing more strikes and get himself ahead of more batters [in the future]."

No runner touched home in the first three innings, though UMass created the best potential. In the first inning, lead-off batter Shaun Skeffington singled to left field and stole both second and third base. Two batters later, Scott Anderson reached first on a walk. A wild pitch offered by BC's Jamie Quiros drew Skeffington home but the ball took an ugly return bounce to the plate and Skeffington was tagged out.

"He went on his own," Coach Stone said. "It was a bad ball that took a funny bounce and came back."

Fast tracking to the third inning, Skeffington was picked off second base by Eagles' catcher Jeff Waldron. Bryan Mazzaferro was then issued a free walk to first but got caught in the act as he was thrown out attempting to steal second.

"It's unfortunate," said Coach Stone. "We should have been up 5-0."

It was Nick Gorneault who would finally initiate the attack as the sophomore dropped a double into left field. Gorneault, stealing third on a wild pitch, then reached home off Gavin Clark's sacrifice fly.

In the top of the sixth inning, UMass catcher Chris Morgan belted a long single to left field. The freshman advanced to second on a ground out, then to third via an error. With the bases loaded, new BC pitcher Eric Olson walked in Morgan to make it 2-0, UMass.

Boston College's nationally ranked offense briefly exploded in the bottom of the sixth inning as Stephen Langone and Sean McGowan ripped back-to-back home runs into the screens in left field. McGowan, the 6-6 senior first baseman, had not watched one pitch pass him as he connected for his 21st longball of the season.

Langone reiterated his point in the seventh when the designated hitter took Szado downtown for a two-run roundtripper to close out the scoring at 4-2.

The Minutemen made a fine showing on paper as they scattered eight hits including three doubles by Skeffington, Gorneault and Seth Kaplan.

It was BC's fourth Beanpot championship in the tournament's 10 year existence.

Yesterday's game will most likely be the last chance for six UMass seniors to play at Fenway, as Mazzaferro, Kaplan, Aaron Braunstein, Brian Samela and Bill Cooke bid adieu to the innards of the park.

For Mazzaferro, who remembers his first at-bat at Fenway, it was a bittersweet day as he watched the freshmen experience the same jitters he once did.

"All the freshmen were all geared up and throwing really hard," he said.

The senior third baseman warmly recalled his first game at Fenway four years ago.

"I was really nervous and anxious. At my first at-bat I couldn't even concentrate. [Yesterday] Walking up to my last at-bat, I thought, 'This is it,'" Mazzaferro said. "I tried the best I could and so I don't have any regrets. It was a privilege to be able to play seven times here."

The Minutemen will host fellow Atlantic 10 member Rhode Island in a three-game series beginning tomorrow. Bill Cooke, Travis Veracka and David Loonie are expected to make the starts for UMass.

Brian Hourigan pitched five innings before being pulled with the score 2-2. The Minutemen fell to Boston College.

Negus key in leadership role

Jay Negus is looking to finish his home career tonight with a win over Syracuse, who the Minutemen haven't beaten in 18 years.

Anyone familiar with the sport of lacrosse will say the most important thing a team can possess is experienced players who lead by example, and in the process make their teammates better.

For four years, as a member of the Massachusetts men's team, senior midfield Jay Negus has excelled in that role, and will now close out his home career tonight against Syracuse at Garber Field.

"The overall experience being a part of this team has been tremendous," Negus said. "I've picked up a lot of things on and off the field that will benefit me for the rest of my life."

Negus has improved on his scoring output each of his first three seasons as a member of the Minutemen squad, a testament to the hard work he put into improving his game.

This year, Negus has posted 11 points on 10 goals and one assist, and will need four points in the remaining two games to bypass last year's total of 14 points.

"I learned from some great players like Mike DelPercio and Chris Grande that it takes hard work and a lot of practice to improve and contribute to the team," Negus said.

Negus has been particularly aggressive on offense this year, firing 56 shots, good for second on the team, while collecting 18 groundballs, starting all 11 games.

However, the numbers are only a portion of his overall contribution to the Minutemen, and Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella will be the first

It is the brass ring, the golden apple. It would be the crown jewel of the tradition- and success-laden program.

For the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, the chance at that ultimate milestone comes tonight at 7 p.m. under the lights at Richard F. Garber Field, when No. 4 Syracuse comes to town.

Greg Cannella knows what a thorn the Orangemen have been in UMass' side. Twice he faced Syracuse as a player, tonight he will be on the opposing bench as coach for the seventh time.

"I think everybody at UMass wants to beat them," he said. "Every alum that's in contact with the program, every parent, every fan wants UMass to beat Syracuse."

The last time the Minutemen claimed a victory over the vaunted Orangemen — a 12-8 in 1981 — the oldest of the current UMass team members, Jay Negus, was a mere four years old.

Tonight, Negus and his four senior classmates — Mike McKeefrey, Bill Cullinan, Justin Koenigsberger and David Kramer — will be honored before their final home appearance.

While Negus and McKeefrey have stolen most of the spotlight with their more marquee positions in the offensive midfield, Koenigsberger, Cullinan and Kramer have played integral roles in this Minuteman campaign.

"Over the last three years, they've gotten opportunities to play. They've played very well because of how they've prepared themselves," Cannella said. "You've got to give them credit because it's tough to come in and maybe not play. There are a lot of guys who came in with those guys who aren't here because they maybe weren't playing, they weren't getting the time."

With the graduation of All-American Harold Drumm, Koenigsberger, who saw some time on the field last season and has picked up 15 groundballs this year, was looked to to be the mainstay of a young defensive unit.

"He came in with the most experience, and that includes our goalie, to help settle guys down, to give whatever he can from his four years of experience," Cannella said. "He's done well. He's helped those guys to stay on par with what we've had in the past."

Kramer, a midfielder who served as the primary faceoff man last season, maintained that position when Jeff Scalo went down with a pre-season injury. He has come on strong lately, taking a few shots in last week's game against Notre Dame and picking up a team-high 31 groundballs this year.

"In the early part of the year he may have lacked a little confidence, then he got himself on a little bit of a role and he's playing with confidence now," Cannella said. "His role doubled when Jeff went down, and that's hard but Dave did really well with it."

It has been Cullinan's work ethic that has impressed Cannella. The defenseman's time comes mostly in man-down situations, although he does play some spot duty. He has picked up four groundballs and he nearly came away with a goal against Boston College earlier this season.

"He's a vocal leader on our team. He has never complained, always worked hard. He's never missed a practice, never missed a workout," Cullinan said. "I think the younger guys should look up to Billy as sort of a role model, this is a guy who didn't have an opportunity to play until this year and he's persevered and fought through that. He's a quality person who will move on and do great things with his life."

George fantastic in two game sweep of Rutgers

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Quite simply, the day belonged to Becky George.

The past few weeks have been a euphoric farewell tour for the centerfielder of the Massachusetts softball team.

Her four hits and two RBIs from the UMass' pair of wins against Rutgers yesterday tell a compelling tale of a senior making the most of her waning days on Totman Field.

During the opening contest, a 6-0 Minutewoman romp, George singled to left field in her first at-bat, driving in both of her two RBIs. After two more hits in game one, George walloped a triple to lead off the third inning of game two, another UMass win, 8-0.

"It was a good day," George said. "When you have that kind of feeling, you just feel like you can go with anything. Those kind of days are good because you're ready for anything."

In front of 400 fans, the veteran left fielder continued to leave a lasting impression in their minds. Her coach, Elaine Sortino, was extremely pleased with George's productivity, but was equally satisfied to see her perform well during two of her final home games.

A–10 Titans to face off against V–tech at Totman

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

The clash of the Atlantic 10 titans is set, and the stakes are high.

In a rematch of last year's A–10 final the Massachusetts softball team will take on Virginia Tech this Sunday at 12 p.m. on the Ruth J. Totman field for a Senior Day doubleheader.

This year Virginia Tech comes to Amherst sporting the longest current win streak in softball at 22 wins. No. 17 Massachusetts boasts the second longest streak at 16. Something has to give this weekend. One team will see its streak put to an end.

The Hookies also hold the lead in the conference with a perfect 12–0 mark. UMass trails Tech by one game with its A–10 record of 11–1.

For Elaine Sortino the win streaks and the conference record to this point are irrelevant. All that matters now is the next game.

"We know what these games mean and they know what these games mean," said Sortino. "I'm sure they are going to come in here and play. They gave us a great final at the Atlantic 10 tournament last year. They're a good team. They have a good pitching staff. They are a much better team then they were a year ago."

The Hookies feature an improved lineup that is

Women's lax to Philly for A–10's

By Seth Koenig

There's always a first.

This weekend in Philadelphia, the first Atlantic 10 conference women's lacrosse title will be won.

Temple, Massachusetts, Virginia Tech and Duquesne will slug it out for the right to be the only team in history to be called A–10 Champ.

UMass enters the tournament seeded second with a 4–1 conference mark, behind No. 1 Temple by one game. In the opening round on Saturday, the Minutewomen will take on the third place Hokies of Virginia Tech, who came to Amherst and lost, 8–7, on April 23.

The most anticipated matchup of the weekend is the hypothetical championship game between UMass and Temple. Massachusetts' only conference loss came at the hands of the

UM track to compete at A–10's

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

Revenge — that is what the Massachusetts women's track and field team will be after when it travels to Blacksburg, Va. for the Atlantic 10 Championships this weekend. The Minutewomen fell short of Virginia Tech at the Atlantic 10 Championships in both the 1997 and 1998 seasons, placing second both years.

The indoor squad also came just shy of Virginia Tech at the A–10 Championships with another second-place finish, surrendering their 1997 title to the Hokies. The stage has been set for the titans to battle it out for the outdoor championships on the VT campus. There is no better place for UMass to recapture the title than on the campus of the rival Hokies.

UMass should not overlook the other teams competing for the championships. The other schools that will travel to Blacksburg to compete for the coveted title include Rhode Island, LaSalle, St. Joseph's, Temple, Dayton, Duquesne and Fordham.

If the incentive to beat VT wasn't enough, the last conference meet for the seniors should ignite a fire in the shoes of the Minutewomen.

Seniors Rose Bryan, Melanie Bell, Shelanda Irish, Raqueil Shelton and Nicole Way will have their final shot at the outdoor title that has eluded them the past three seasons.

The most consistent group of performers of the season has been the 4x100 relay team, which consists of Bryan, Irish, freshman standout Abby Rubino and Shelton. Way is coming off of an A–10 performer of the meet performance at the indoors and is in full stride.

Chairman Carlin resigns from Board of Higher Ed

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

James Carlin, the Chairman of the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education, announced on Thursday that he will be resigning.

Carlin oversaw four consecutive cuts in tuition for the University of Massachusetts, although his eye for the bottom line earned him criticism from state college officials who saw him as being more concerned with costs than quality.

Explaining his decision, Carlin stated, "I just think there's a right time to leave these kinds of jobs. I think you want to leave before people want you to leave."

"Most of what we set out to do in 1995 has been done," he added.

Although Carlin has suffered from several heart attacks recently, he stated that his health problems were "no factor" in his retirement.

"I feel good about the three-and-a-half years I served," Carlin said. "We've cut tuition four times, and I feel great about the Commonwealth College," he added, referring to the new, multi-million dollar honors college being created by the University for the coming fall.

Carlin's unpopularity with UMass professors was made evident by the words of Afro–American Studies professor John Bracey, the secretary of the UMass Faculty Senate. "He was a bad choice from the beginning," said Bracey, upon learning of Carlin's retirement. "I don't think he had any particular vision for the University. He just wanted to keep costs down and make people work harder, and that was about it."

Bracey suggested that Carlin, a businessman, be replaced by "a person who understands what a university is, and doesn't think the University is some sort of a variation of a corporation."

"You need somebody with a broader view of the world, and I don't think he had that," Bracey added.

Stanley Z. Koplik, the chancellor of the Board of Higher Education, had kinder words for Carlin, calling him "instrumental in making the public education system measurably better and immensely more affordable.

"James Carlin's departure will be sorely missed by all of us," said Koplik.
